Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I do not know whether they are financially ruined or not. I do not know what their financial condition may be; but I know if you rely on this bill for fertilizer, we will be sorry they are not manufacturing as before.

Now, I want to discuss another phase of this matter before I conclude. I do not think anyone in this House would contemplate with any degree of satisfaction whatever Government operation. I think the judgment as well as the good sense of the membership is such that they would not care to go into this matter on the scale and at the vast expense that would be required. Other gentlemen may minimize the amount of the expenditure, but I can not, on my conscience, for a minute reduce the amount to less than $100,000,000, and I believe the loss of the Government would exceed that sum.

Then it is provided in the bill that if anybody takes over this lease and fails in its operation and the Government can not find a new lessee within six months, the Government shall then operate. Eighteen months and six months specified in the measure are entirely too inadequate in time. Gentlemen of great financial capacity and at least of apparent frankness and fairness who came before our committee made the statement that no one could hope to finance such an enterprise under present financial conditions.

So it seems to me, in conclusion—and I do not want to ask for more time—when we consider this proposition here, we are faced inevitably and inescapably with this problem of Government operation, and I am willing to be judged concerning this prediction by the future. It is easy to say on this floor to-day that a lessee can be found, and it might be easy for me to say that no lessee will be found and that it means with certainty Government operation, but as between these two predictions I ask you to appeal to your own judgment as to what will transpire.

It seems to me the ultimate outcome of this situation is Government operation of this plant; and I say that as against the cost that would inevitably and inescapably be put on the Government, with all its well-recognized lack of efficiency in operating business enterprises, we would better take and charge off the loss over and above what we realize from sale of the water power instead of throwing a horde of good money after a horde of squandered money foolishly spent in the pursuit of a will o' the wisp.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Yes.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Will the gentleman deny that this bill directs the leasing of this property at any time within the next 50 years when it can be leased?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. This is my understanding; and if I am not correct, I have no desire to misrepresent, and I would thank the gentleman in his own time to correct me. My understanding is that if a lease is not made by this board within 18 months, then there is to be Government operation. Does the gentleman contend I am wrong about that?

Mr. PETTENGILL. But at any time and at all times within 50 years there is a positive direction to the board to conclude a lease whenever one can be concluded.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. But if it does not lease within six months, then the Government operates.

Mr. GLOVER. In 18 months.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. No; in six months where there is a failure.

Mr. PETTENGILL. But thereafter it can be leased.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I will agree to that. I do not want to misrepresent. I scorn an argument that rests upon willful misrepresentation. We may differ in our views or be mistaken; but if a lessee is not found within six months, then the Government must operate, and within the period, if they can find a lessee, I would take it they are under obligation to do so.

Mr. ALMON. Then the Government may discontinue Government operations and lease it, if they can get an opportunity to do so.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. If they can find a lessee.

Let me say, in conclusion, in my opinion, the people of this country are against Government ownership in this form and would vigorously resent our bringing about such a solution of this problem. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of our time to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the protagonists of this bill, in justification of the Government-operation feature, claim that it will induce the leasing of the property if no private lease can be obtained. What a ridiculous position for any person who has the slightest knowledge of business economics to take. It is conceded that no lease can be obtained under these conditions, ergo, the Government must take this nitrate plant No. 2, acknowledged to be obsolete, go into the market and equip it at an expense of millions and millions of dollars, authorize this board of three, sympathetic with this plan, to invest $36,000,000 at the beginning in the building of Cove Creek Dam, equip the plant with accessories and supplies to the extent of $16,000,000, and when it has been proven, as has always been proven with respect to Government operation of other business projects, that such operation is impracticable, then they say, after we have dumped some more millions of dollars, $50,000,000 or $75,000,000 in addition to the $173,000,000 that we have dumped already into this plant, we will then be in a better position to enter into a lease with private individuals. Such arrant nonsense. After the Government has confessed, as they must, the futility of going into the private business of fertilizer manufacture, they intimate that the threat of the Government to go into a chimerical business venture where production is glutting the market will deter some private competing manufacturer to take the white elephant off their hands some time during the 50 years.

I have never heard of a more ridiculous legislative proposal in my 20 years of service on this floor. Never has there been such an asinine proposal submitted as an excuse for Government operation than the one that this provision will be a threat to private industry. We will not be able to secure a lease; but then we will revamp it, employ some experts, have some more agricultural experiments, and put in modern, up-to-date machinery at the expense of the Government.

The fertilizer diggers, in the name of the oppressed planters, will come to Congress every year, saying, "We need $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 more," and the Congress, following the sway of group favoritism, will continue to pour the money into the fertilizer barrel as fast as it runs out of the fertilizer bunghole.

Yesterday you voted against the policy of balancing the Budget, and now you are going to outrage the public sense of the country by adding a possible burden of over $100,- 000,000 for the benefit of whom? For the benefit of the Tennessee Valley, of the Representatives from Tennessee, Alabama, and the near-by Southern States, who will receive with open hands the bounty under this proposed Government subsidy.

The United States Government, the taxpayers, are to continue to hold the bag to the extent of $173,000,000, and before we get through with it it will be $273,000,000. You espousers of this unheard-of governmental subsidy must take the responsibility.

We are willing to join you in a reasonable leasing proposition, but we will not outrage the taxpayers of the country by this legislative appropriation and grab, which will involve an expense of over $100,000,000 additional.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Is there any expense involved by the Government for 18 months?

Mr. STAFFORD. Why do you put in a legislative proposal providing for Government operation of an ancient plant in competition with private plants that are lying idle because of overproduction and underconsumption? If you had any faith in the leasing proposition, you would not put in the outrageous proposition in reference to the Cove Creek Dam and the socialistic Government operation, which will require the expenditure of possibly seventy-five or a hundred million dollars. That is your socialistic baby. Take it. [Applause.]

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of time on this side to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL], who was chairman of the subcommittee that prepared this bill, a subcommittee on which there were four of the majority party and three of the minority party.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, we have heard all kinds of statements on this floor during this debate with reference to piling up an enormous burden upon the Federal Treasury. The truth is that under this bill there can be practically no expense whatever for utilizing the properties at Muscle Shoals for at least a year and a half after the enactment of the bill into law. And then after the bill is enacted, if no lease is secured during the period of a year and a half, before any expense can be made the Congress of the United States—this House, if you please—will have to appropriate the money for the expense.

Under this bill, even if there is no lease and we should be forced to Government operation, it would be necessary to appropriate for Government operation a sum of only about $2,000,000; and to-day over $2,500,000 in power is going to waste over the big Government dam at Muscle Shoals.

So even if you appropriate the $2,000,000 you would still have a saving of over $500,000 for the first year, and there would not necessarily follow any further appropriation so far as your nitrate production was concerned.

With reference to Cove Creek Dam, the bill expressly provides that that dam shall not be built until the Government secures a lessee or, if you have Government operation, your board certifies that the additional power which the Cove Creek Dam would produce is necessary for the manufacture of nitrogen and fertilizer.

If you secure a lessee, you are insured a reasonable return on any money that you put into the Cove Creek Dam, and you are assured that over a reasonable period every dollar that the Government invests in the dam will come back into the Treasury of the United States. [Applause.]

If there is Government operation, not a dollar will be spent on Cove Creek Dam until the board says that we must have additional power which the dam will afford.

What does that mean? It means that there will be successful Government operation at Muscle Shoals and money will go into the Treasury from the Government operation, which will insure the return to the Treasury of the United States of the original investment in Cove Creek Dam.

So all of the argument about a raid on the Treasury and the taking of millions of dollars is unjustified and unfounded. [Applause.] If during the year and a half no lease has been made, when the question comes as to whether or not we will make the appropriation of some $2,000,000 to commence the operation of the nitrate plant, we then, as sensible men, as sound and businesslike men, will determine that proposition. In my judgment, there will be a lease of this property if this bill is passed; and I know of no better fact in substantiation of this opinion than the fact that although the Muscle Shoals Commission appointed by the President and the Governors of the States of Tennessee and Alabama had no authority to make a lease, although they asked for no proposals of lease, yet some eight prospective lessees took up with them the matter of a lease, and said to them that they perhaps would like to make a lease, and asked the commission to submit terms for a lease. There never has been a time since Muscle Shoals was built when there was not a lessee knocking on yonder door asking for a lease of these properties.

I realize the economic situation in this country to-day, but I can not believe that it is going to continue forever, and the only way that we can legislate is not on the basis of some unusual situation but on what is the normal average situation in this country, and this bill which we present to you to-day is an organic, basic bill for the disposition of Muscle Shoals. If you will pass this bill, then the people of this country can no longer indict the Congress of the United States for permitting those great plants to remain idle, and for permitting two and a half millions of dollars of water going over the dam to waste each year. This bill is constructive. It will dispose of these properties, and dispose of them in a sound, businesslike way, and in keeping with the original dedication of the properties at Muscle Shoals.

Much has been said here that if we have Government operation it will mean the Government of the United States competing with its private citizens. It is not a matter of competing with private citizens; it is a proposition of freeing the farmers of this country from their dependence on Chile and other foreign countries for their nitrogen. You will recall that up to the time of the invention of the fixation of nitrogen from the air practically all nitrogen used for fertilizer came from Chile in the form of Chilean nitrate, and the farmers of this country were absolutely at the mercy of the Chilean nitrate producers, and they had to pay the Government of Chile some $12.53 a ton for every ton of nitrogen exported from Chile. The farmers of this country were practically forced to support the Government of Chile.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Not at this moment. I do not want to be discourteous.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I understand.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Then came the invention to take the nitrogen out of the air, condense it into substance, and put it on the land. Germany, Great Britain, France, Italy, by governmental help, if you please, established at once the nitrogen industry in their respective countries, and they freed their farmers from any further dependence upon Chile for their nitrates. To-day, Germany, the bankrupt nation of the world, is producing more nitrogen than Chile and is furnishing nitrogen to the farmers of this country. After these other countries established their nitrogen industries, what did they do? They joined hands with Chile and formed a world cartel or a world monopoly on nitrogen, and the farmers of this country have been absolutely at the mercy of this world monopoly as to the price they paid for nitrogen. To-day Germany is coming here to the United States, going to Florida, getting phosphate rock, taking that rock 3,000 miles across the Atlantic, then 125 miles up a canal, and then 100 miles on a railroad, taking the phosphoric acid out of that rock, mixing it with nitrogen, taken out of the air in Germany, and shipping it back to the United States to our farmers.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman tell the committee how many tons of nitrogen have been imported from Germany?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The last normal year in this country was the year 1929. During 1929 there was imported into this country nitrogen in the amount of 159,075 tons, and these nitrogen fixation plants in the United States that all through the years in the discussion of Muscle Shoals we have heard so much about, in that year turned out for the agriculture of this country only 84,000 tons. It was a matter of 159,000 tons of imported nitrogen compared to 84,000 tons from the plants in the United States. What this bill would do would be to free the American farmer from dependence on Germany, Chile, and other foreign countries. [Applause.]

Mr. ALMON. And the corporation would not be in competition with private industry, but it would be in competition with a foreign monopoly.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. All we want to do is to free the farmer from the foreign monopoly.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. What reduction in the price of nitrates to the American farmers does the gentleman estimate would result to them by reason of this acquisition of Muscle Shoals?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The Muscle Shoals inquiry commission appointed by President Coolidge and headed by that great conservative statesman from Illinois, the former chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, Mr. McKenzie, estimated that the proper operation of Muscle Shoals would save the farmers of the country at least 43 per cent in the cost of their fertilizers.

Much has been said with reference to these plants being obsolete, and that the cyanamid process, the process used by the great plant at Muscle Shoals, is obsolete. That is absolutely wrong.

I have here an issue of the Chemical and Metallurgical Journal for June, 1928. I read as follows from the Journal:

> From these facts some have inferred that the direct synthetic process is replacing all other processes, a conclusion which is wholly unwarranted. The fixation of nitrogen by the cyanamid process has steadily increased, in fact by a larger percentage during the last few years than any other process, and this is true despite the claims by some that the cyanamid process is obsolete and no longer a factor in nitrogen production.

The largest nitrogen-producing plant in the Western Hemisphere for producing agricultural nitrogen is the great plant of the American Cyanamid Co. at Niagara Falls in Canada. That plant is using the cyanamide process, which is exactly the same process as is used by the big Government plant at Muscle Shoals. When the Government got ready to build the big plant at Muscle Shoals, what did it do? It got the American Cyanamid Co. to come down and build that plant for it. Of course, it has been 12 years since the big plant at Muscle Shoals has been operated. Necessarily there have been some improvements in that time, and the big plant at Muscle Shoals must be brought down to date, just like the American Cyanamid Co. has from time to time taken advantage of new inventions and brought its plant down to date. But fundamentally the Government plant at Muscle Shoals is exactly the same plant, using exactly the same process, as is the plant of the American Cyanamid Co. in Canada.

To-day some 350,000 tons of fixed nitrogen are being produced throughout the world by the cyanamide process, which is five times as much as is the production by the synthetic process in the United States.

I have here a very interesting map which shows the different cyanamid plants scattered throughout the different countries of the world. The map shows some 42 of them. There is nothing more untrue than the proposition that the cyanamid process is obsolete.

Mr. ALMON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. ALMON. Is any of the nitrogen produced by the synthetic process used for the benefit of agriculture in this country?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. In 1929 there were some 84,000 tons.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman tell the House how much nitrogen that plant has ever produced?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. It has not produced a great amount, for the reason that the plant was finished after the war closed, and it produced just enough nitrogen to demonstrate it could do the job. In other words, when the Cyanamid Co. turned the plant over to the Government, the Government said, "We want to know if this plant will produce nitrogen." And they operated the plant and produced a sufficient amount of nitrogen to show that the plant would produce. The war had terminated and there was no longer any need to operate it.

Mr. GOSS. They operated it for two weeks and made about 1,500 tons?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. The amount which I stated, 1,600 tons, was about correct, then?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes, sir.

One of the greatest problems confronting this country to-day, if not the greatest, is the problem of soil depletion. In the United States each year our soil is exhausted to the amount of some 3,500,000 tons of nitrogen. Over 118,000,000 acres of farm land are thus depleted each year. There are just two forces that destroy national life. One is an invading army; the other is the depletion of the soil. Invading armies wipe out peoples and civilizations. Depletion of the soil makes it impossible for peoples and nations to sustain life in their habitat. They move on as in times gone by the people of Greece moved to the more fertile lands of southern Italy. In soil depletion lies the tragic story of the fall of Babylon, of Greece, and of Rome. Shall we permit our America to become a China, with her soil so depleted that she can make only one crop in seven years? Are we to become an India where, because of soil exhaustion, famine haunts a destitute people?

It is said there are more hungry people in India every year than the entire population of the United States. Muscle Shoals is a great step toward the solution of this problem, toward putting back into the soil the nitrogen which through the years we have been taking out.

To-day the United States uses 6.4 pounds of plant food per crop acre. Germany uses 200 pounds; Belgium, 513 pounds; Holland, 675; France and Italy, 150. All of these figures show that the day is at hand when we must use more nitrogen, when we must take steps to replenish the soil that is so rapidly being exhausted. The great element of plant food which we need is the nitrogen. Through the years the cost of nitrogen has been so great that our farmers have not been able to buy it. At Muscle Shoals we will start a great production of nitrogen and of concentrated fertilizer which the proponents of this bill believe will mark a tremendous step forward in the progress and advancement of fertilizer, its production, and its use. To-day the farmers of this country are using fertilizer containing only 16 per cent plant food. In other words, out of a 100-pound sack of fertilizer some 84 pounds are practically worthless, so far as any value to the crops is concerned. When we can get the farmer's fertilizer up to the point where it will contain not 16 per cent but as high as 50 or 60 or 70 per cent of plant food, millions of dollars will be saved in freight, in sacking, in handling, and, furthermore, experiments show that concentrated fertilizer will get far better results from the land.

The great purpose of Muscle Shoals is to inaugurate what Germany has already inaugurated—a great development of concentrated fertilizer for this country.

Mr. ALMON. What about nitrate of soda? Chilean nitrate contains only 15 per cent of plant food.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The Chilean nitrate contains only 15 per cent of plant food. In other words, every time we get a ton of Chilean nitrate we have to pay the freight for hauling it some 4,000 miles from Chile to this country and only 15 per cent of the product is any good from the standpoint of plant food.

I do not agree with my eminent friend from Illinois that Muscle Shoals is no longer of any use to national defense.

As General Pershing once said, "In the Muscle Shoals nitrate plants the Government has a permanent installation which is of the greatest importance." Nitrate plant No. 2, the big plant, will fix sufficient nitrogen for the manufacture of ammunition for an army of 2,000,000 men. The value of Muscle Shoals for national defense is not to be discounted because of the fact that fixed nitrogen can be produced in by-product coke ovens scattered through the country or because several private plants for nitrogen fixation have been built. There is a vast difference in military value between plants which merely fix nitrogen without producing explosives and the plant which is prepared to turn out the finished explosive ingredient ready for ammunition factories. The contingencies of war and national emergency may make the use of the Muscle Shoals properties for munitions purposes indispensable, not only to insure an adequate supply of explosives but also to measure fairly and adequately the reasonable value of munitions and thus to fix a yardstick for such munitions as the Government may be compelled to buy from private manufacturers.

The importance of Muscle Shoals to the national defense is appreciated when we recall that during the World War we required every available merchantman that we could find to carry our troops to the front line, to supply them with food and munitions of war, and to move the commerce of the United States, and yet in that dire necessity we were compelled to use nearly one-third of our merchant marine to bring over the 4,000-mile route from Chile the nitrate to make the powder and the explosives without which we were utterly helpless to make war. Let us not forget that the first real naval battle of the war was fought in December, 1914, off the coast of Chile, when the British and Japanese gunboats intercepted the German fleet endeavoring to give protection to German merchantmen coming out from Chile with cargoes of Chilean nitrate.

The bill will contribute mightily to the navigation of the Tennessee River, with its channel of 652 miles twisting capriciously until it empties into the Ohio 67 miles from the Mississippi. It will control in large measure the floods on the Tennessee and even lessen the ravages of those on the Father of Waters. The bill insures the disposition of the nitrate plants at Muscle Shoals through private operation, if possible, and if not, then through Government operation. The bill is liberal in its leasing provisions, affords every opportunity for a lease that will be fair to the lessee and yield a reasonable return to the Government on its investment. The bill contemplates at Muscle Shoals a great electrochemical development requiring coal, coke, limestone, phosphate, and various other raw material.

The labor necessary for fertilizer-plant operations, limestone quarries, phosphate mines, coal mines, coke ovens, and electrochemical operations will require a population of thousands of men in Alabama and Tennessee. For 12 years the people of the Tennessee Valley have awaited the disposition of Muscle Shoals as the entering wedge for the development of the valley. The bill will forge the first link in the chain of development and open up the industrial empire of the Tennessee Valley destined to become a greater Ruhr. As has been said, there are in the Tennessee Valley conjunctions of raw materials of all kinds, of coal, iron, and water power more fateful than conjunctions of the stars. The bill will keep the promise of the Government to the farmer, afford cheaper fertilizer, and lighten the burdens of him who is a partner with God to liberate the forces of nature and feed and clothe the teeming millions of the Nation. It will set an honest standard of cost for the generation of electric power for the benefit of the millions of power consumers of the land. It will keep available for use the powder horn of the Nation.

There comes down to us through the ages the injunction to multiply and replenish the earth and the earth must be replenished with nitrogen. Wherever man looks the living, moving, doing thing in the world is nitrogen, constantly reminding us that "There's a divinity that shapes our ends, rough hew them how we will." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the general purposes of this act are declared to be to aid American agriculture and to provide for national defense by the employment of the Muscle Shoals project, primarily for the production and development of fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients, and secondarily for the production of chemicals.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

For the purpose of clearing the minds of the Members of the committee who might have the impression that the farmers who are to-day using Chilean nitrate are paying $11.20 excise duty to the Government of Chile, I will say that is not the condition to-day. That was the case many, many years ago; but that was abandoned some years back, so the American farmers are not paying one cent of tribute for the support of the Chilean Government.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Instead of paying it in the form of taxes to the Government of Chile they are paying it for other charges that go to the Chilean Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman knows if he has read the hearings that the Cosach monopoly runs the Chilean nitrate mines, and that 50 per cent of whatever profit results goes to the Chilean Government. But that from the development of nitrate plants throughout the countries of the world this Chilean monopoly has not made any money for the past several years.

What are the facts as to the cost to the farmer for the fertilizer that has been used? Let me call the gentleman's attention to the record. Just at the close of the war 20 pounds of nitrogen, in nitrate of soda, cost $4.54. To-day the same unit can be bought for $2.25, less than half what it was at that time. Now, let us take nitrogen in the form of sulphate of ammonia. In the same period nitrogen in the form of sulphate of ammonia has come down even more radically. During the war sulphate of ammonia sold for $4.74 per unit. To-day it sells for 97 cents per unit.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Of course, the gentleman knows that during this economic depression the prices of everything are down.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. And I hope the gentleman does not think the price of everything is going to stay where it is to-day.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will not deny that the farmers are not in position to purchase it because of the depressed condition; and the gentleman will not deny that private industry has so manipulated its production of nitrogen that more is being produced to-day than the market demands, and more than the market can use even under normal conditions.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The gentleman does deny that.

Mr. STAFFORD. At Hopewell, Va., a private industry is capable of producing 600,000 tons of nitrogen, and all we have been importing of Chilean nitrate is 365,000 tons a year.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. According to statistics submitted by Mr. Charles J. Brand, the executive secretary of the National Fertilizer Association, in the year 1929 they manufactured for agriculture some 84,000 tons of nitrogen.

Mr. STAFFORD. And because the farmers of the country have been accustomed to using low-nitrogen-content fertilizer and have been accustomed to using Chilean nitrate the gentleman can not claim that they are not in a position to use more for fertilizer.

The gentleman in his bill seeks to establish the experiment at the expense of the Government of the United States of educating the people to use concentrated fertilizer. Now, the farmers are going to continue for a long time to come to use the character of fertilizer they have been accustomed to using, and that is in the form of low-nitrogen-content fertilizer.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman seems to have so much experience as to what the farmers want that maybe the gentleman can tell me whether the farmers in the gentleman's State are opposed to this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Every member of the committee agreed that this bill is only for the aid of the farmers in the cotton-growing belt, where, by reason of tremendous exhaustion and erosion of the soil, it is so necessary to have large quantities of fertilizer.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In other words, if the farmers of the Northwest were to be benefited by the bill they would be for it?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not so constitutionally sectional as the gentleman intimates. In Milwaukee, my home city, we have a fertilizer plant that is shut down. The gentleman can not charge sectional feeling to me in connection with this bill. The bill is sectional pork, as far as the Cove Creek Dam is concerned. It seeks to appropriate millions and millions of dollars on a proposition there for power purposes for the benefit of a locality only.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EATON of Colorado: Page 1, line 8, after the word "chemicals," strike out the period, insert a colon, and add: "Provided, however, That this act shall not become effective until the phosphate and fertilizer lands of the United States in the States of Utah and New Mexico now under lease and/or permit of the United States shall show signs of depletion within the terms of the existing lease and/or permits."

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the proposed amendment is in no sense germane to the section or the bill. We are not dealing with experimental propositions in potash or reading the signs of the future. In the interest of time I am compelled to make the point of order.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order. This bill is for the purpose of providing for the leasing and other utilization of the Muscle Shoals properties in the interest of national defense and of agriculture, and for other purposes. The leasing of the lands of the United States containing phosphate have to do with exactly the same purposes, namely, national defense, agriculture, and other purposes.

It may be possible that this amendment might properly be attached to another paragraph of this bill, but it seemed to me, as I examined the bill, that the place to draw attention to the matters I will mention was right here at this first paragraph, which sets forth the purposes of the bill. The purpose of this bill is to aid American agriculture and provide for the national defense. How? By employing the Muscle Shoals project. How else?

The last phrase of the section reads—primarily for the production and development of fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients, and secondarily for the production of chemicals.

Before the Public Lands Committee of this House phosphate deposits of the United States now under lease and now under permit have been under consideration from time to time. I have not the least idea as to the extent of the development in New Mexico, except as I learned it before the Public Lands Committee. We listened to these same words as used here—about P_2O_5—potash, phosphoric acid fertilizer, and other words having to do with phosphoric acid and the making of fertilizer. Many statements made here in regard to Muscle Shoals have been made with respect to phosphate lands, including that they are necessary for the national defense of the country. Right now there are millions of dollars invested and under contract depending upon the operation under existing leases and permits from the United States Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must address himself to the point of order rather than to the merits of his amendment.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I was trying to demonstrate that by the merits. The statements we have heard before the Public Lands Committee point to exactly the same question which is in this bill, namely, the leasing and utilization of properties of the United States for the purpose of national defense, for the purpose of agriculture, and for other purposes. My amendment has to do with properties of the United States that are already under such lease and already under such permit, and my amendment proposes to postpone the effective date of the operation of this bill until such time as the lands included in the existing leases and permits from the United States show signs of depletion.

The records in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office show that there are in existence three leases in New Mexico covering 7,674.39 acres, and four in California covering 7,783.80 acres; a total of 15,458.19 acres.

Permits outstanding are as follows:

State	Number of permits	Acres covered
New Mexico	90	202,990.10

A large acreage in Utah and Nebraska has been patented as phosphate lands. I have not the area at hand this moment.

The United States is already interested in the development of phosphate for fertilizer purposes. The bill before us, if passed, would put the Government into competition with its own lands already leased and under operation by individuals who have a right to expect that they may continue their production without interference from a new source of supply under the circumstances set forth in the bill.

It has been estimated that 120,000 tons of phosphoric acid (P_2O_5) may be produced at Muscle Shoals at a cost of $43.55 per ton and that fertilizer made therefrom may be shipped from Maine to California. I do not find a statement of the cost of making the fertilizer from the phosphoric acid.

Under date of April 19, 1932, the Department of the Interior issued the following statement:

Assurance of a latent supply of potash for fertilizer that is sufficient to carry the country through another emergency such as the World War is given by the Geological Survey. This assurance is extended at the termination of five years of exploration, mostly in the great Permian Basin in the Southwest, which was authorized by Congress and for which $500,000 was provided.

This exploration, so far as the Permian Basin was concerned, consisted in putting 23 wells down with diamond drills to depths ranging from 500 to 3,000 feet and an examination of the resulting cores which revealed the various formations that lie beneath the basin at these 23 points. In addition, the results of wells drilled by many private individuals were made available to the Government representatives. They also tested thousands of samples obtained from oil-well operators. These operators do not ordinarily produce cores, but cuttings brought up by their churn-drill operations may be tested and often provide valuable clues. In fact, the study of well cuttings served as the basis for the selection of all the sites chosen for the tests by core drill.

As a proof of the field, the Geological Survey calls attention to the fact that the United States Potash Co., of New Mexico, in the first year of its operation, ending in March, shipped 45,000 tons of potash to numerous plants in the East, where it was used by different fertilizer-mixing companies.

This first year of production from the first mine in operation was sufficient to amount to about 4 per cent of the national requirements.

The known ore bodies in the vicinity of this mine, the experts of the Geological Survey state, are sufficient to supply the Nation for decades in time of need. The indications are, they state, that this area of the United States contains potash deposits that in quality are the equal or superior of those in Germany and Alsace, which heretofore have been the principal sources of supply for the world.

The Permian Basin, 300 miles wide and possibly twice as long, lying principally in Texas and New Mexico but extending north into Kansas and Colorado, was at one time, geologically speaking, occupied by a great arm of the ocean or sea that became cut off in such a way that its waters evaporated and left their salts behind. In fact, the indications are that this sea may have filled up and evaporated a succession of times. Potash was contained in some of the salts that were left behind.

Government geologists recognized decades ago that the formations here were similar to those in Germany and that there were probabilities that an investigation would establish the presence of potash. The area, in fact, proved to have a much simpler structure than the German, since it was much less broken. Federal and State agencies made preliminary investigations at about the same time, but the first find of potash was announced by the Texas State geologist, Doctor Udden, in 1912, as a result of his examination of brines taken from a deep boring.

When the World War stopped the importation of potash from Germany many soils, notably those producing cotton, failed to yield satisfactory crops. They were without an essential ingredient.

The Government finished drilling its first well near Amarillo, Tex., in 1917, and a private test core was taken near Carlsbad, N. Mex., at about the same time. Government geologists in the meantime were studying and analyzing the cuttings that came to light from oil operations. There were many indications of potash.

Finally, in 1926, Congress authorized the more intensive investigation by the Geological Survey, cooperating with the Bureau of Mines, and provided $100,000 a year for five years for the purpose. Twenty-three wells, in as many locations, were drilled in New Mexico and Texas and an additional well in the Salt Valley area in Utah. Practically all of them showed deposits containing potash at many levels, many of which were in strata too thin to make mining practicable. A number of bodies of ore were discovered, however, that have immediate or future commercial possibilities.

The most favorable prospects lie in that sweep of open semi-desert country between San Angelo, Tex., and Roswell, N. Mex., cut deep by the Pecos River and celebrated in many a cowboy romance of the West, notably that of Billy the Kid. The greater area is in Texas, where there is no Government land, but the best deposits that have been found are in New Mexico on the public domain, and the Government will share in money returns.

Sinking 23 wells in an area as big as New England by no means constitutes an adequate exploration, of course, but is regarded more as a guide and encouragement to the private potash hunter. Assurance is felt at the Department of the Interior that the basis for a potash industry has been established and that, in the course of time, the United States will be able to supply itself with this indispensable ingredient of fertilizer.

I am informed that in the Uintah Basin in Utah there is a deposit of phosphate rock 22 feet in thickness, almost horizontal, and with very little overburden, covering an area of about 2,900 acres, and an additional area of about 10,000 acres with a greater overburden. To manufacture a quantity of phosphoric acid equal to the estimate of 120,000 tons would require about 10 acres annually. So in this one area alone there is available a 290-year supply comparable to the estimated annual supply from Muscle Shoals. In New Mexico, a similar situation exists, and I am told the production costs are less than in Utah. It may well be said that the supply is inexhaustible. Probably some of you are more familiar with the Nebraska deposits from which the phosphoric acid has been produced in large quantities. The mining, smelting, and manufacture may all be done at a cost lower than any of the suggested figures of cost at Muscle Shoals.

I therefore submit that this amendment should be adopted at this place in the bill. But if for parliamentary reasons it should be ruled out of order here, I will offer the amendment to the last paragraph of the bill which designates that this act shall become immediately effective.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BLAND). The Chair is ready to rule. This bill relates to the leasing of the Muscle Shoals project. In the opinion of the Chair the amendment relates to the leasing of certain lands in the West, which is not germane either to the bill or to the section. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have listened to the discussion of this bill to-day with a great deal of interest. We have had the leasing or operating of Muscle Shoals before us heretofore, and it was then thoroughly discussed.

The farmers in the Southland believe, as I do, that the development of Muscle Shoals for the making of nitrogen will cheapen their fertilizer, and that that will do more to aid agriculture than almost anything that could be done in one measure.

This bill would simply carry out the original purpose expressed in the original act—that Muscle Shoals should be developed and be used in time of war for national defense. It ought always to be kept for that purpose, because we do not know what might happen although we hope it will never have to be used for that purpose. The other purpose of the original act was that when it was not used for national defense it should be used for the purpose of aiding agriculture by the production of nitrogen to make cheaper fertilizer.

Anybody who has had any actual experience in farming in our Southland, where we use a great deal of this fertilizer, knows very well that high cost fertilizer is one of the most expensive things we have to deal with, and it is one of the things that makes farming unprofitable there.

The gentleman from Alabama a few moments ago made an argument on this question that I do not believe anybody can successfully answer. He stated in his speech that the development of the Muscle Shoals project would result in a saving of at least 43 per cent to the farmers on their fertilizer. Whether it will save that much or not we do not know, but it would very materially reduce the cost of fertilizer.

There has been a mighty influence working against this bill. It ought to have been a law a number of years ago. You have the power interests in this country and you have the great fertilizer interests, if not a trust. The fertilizer people have always fought this bill and always will.

This bill provides that you have 18 months in which to lease this plant, which has cost us several millions of dollars, which is standing idle to-day and is practically making nothing. It is estimated this bill will save more than $100,000,000 each year to the farmers, and they should have it.

Some say that it can not be leased or will not be leased in this period of depression, and that the Government will operate it. The truth of the matter is that we would be very glad for the Government to operate it for a little time and show the country just exactly what the fertilizer interests are doing to agriculture in this country. They are not going to let it be operated by the Government. You need not be uneasy about that. If you had that plant developed by the Government and could put fertilizer out at 60 per cent of what it is now costing, you would have the people absolutely demanding that it be operated thereafter by the Government.

With the present agricultural conditions in this country to-day we talk about balancing the Budget. You had better think about going out into the farming sections of the Nation and balancing the budget of the farmer. There is the basis of our wealth, and if you keep on impoverishing agriculture, as is being done now by a low commodity price under which they can not live and pay their taxes, you are not going to have any revenue from that source. If you had started at the bottom instead of the top to bring about prosperity, you could have done it by spending the money that has been spent and you would have had some money flowing back into the Treasury.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I have not spoken on this bill, and at the proper place I shall offer an amendment to this bill, and at that time it is not my purpose to discuss the amendment at length. I therefore ask unanimous consent to proceed at this time for 10 minutes.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, we are compelled to make progress if we are to complete the consideration of this bill to-day, and I am going to have to invoke the rule that amendments proposed must be substantial amendments. I think five minutes is all that the gentleman ought to have. There are a great many members of the committee who have not spoken, and I feel that I shall have to object to the gentleman's request in the interest of saving time.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the request.

The amendment which I shall offer will be on page 3 and in section 4, and will qualify the manner of leasing. It will not permit the board to enter into leases with firms, persons, or corporations with which they are in any way connected. I shall offer this amendment at the proper time.

Two hundred and fifty million dollars a year is the cost of commercial fertilizer that our farmers are now using. It is estimated that this bill will save 43 per cent of that amount. Forty-three per cent would be $107,000,000 annually that this bill would save the farmers of our Nation. In two years it would save $214,000,000, which is more than the moneys which have already been expended in the development of Muscle Shoals, and in addition that which would be required to complete the project. You will see that this will more than pay for any additional improvements which we may hope to put there. So, after all, it is a great saving to the American people, and I would particularly call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD], who made such a splendid address from his point of view, to this fact. When we save for one class of our American people we are saving for all our American people. I would direct the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], to the fact that even though his people in the rich valley of the upper Mississippi are not directly benefited by this bill, yet the farmers of the South would be greatly benefited by the enactment of this legislation. So if you would save your own farmers, I would ask you to bear in mind that there are other farmers in other sections of our country who are in even worse circumstances than those in the fertile lands of the Mississippi Valley and Great Lakes region.

I can not blame the gentleman from Illinois when he so ably champions the industry of his district. I can not blame him when he hears the thundering and roaring wheels of industry propelled by electric power in his country. I can not blame the gentleman when he fails to hear the call of the farmers in my section of the country; yes, those who are dependent upon their fields for their existence and have no thundering wheels of industry; but I can not understand how the gentleman can extend his hearing across the great Atlantic Ocean into the mines of Germany and how he can hear on down to Chile, around the Antarctic Ocean. He hears the voice of the Chilean Nitrate Co., and obeys this voice rather than the pleas of the farmers of the South. We have been pleading with the Congress for the last several years to carry out the purpose and the intent of Congress when it authorized the first appropriation for Muscle Shoals, by operating it during peace time for the manufacture of fertilizer.

Florida is one of the largest consumers of commercial fertilizer. We use it for the growth of our vegetables and fruits. In some cases even a ton per acre may be used. Our farmers can not continue to pay the present high price of commercial fertilizer, particularly nitrogenous fertilizer. We are entitled to the benefits of Muscle Shoals.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the President is hereby authorized, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint a board consisting of three members, to be known as the Muscle Shoals Board. Each member shall receive a salary at the rate of $10,000 per annum. The terms of office of the members first appointed shall be 2, 4, and 6 years, respectively. Successors shall be appointed by the President for a term of six years from the expiration of the terms for which the predecessor was appointed. Appointments to vacancies shall be for the unexpired term.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides for the utilization of the plant at Muscle Shoals. It was built under the act of June 3, 1916, and constructed during war times. We have been considering legislation with reference to Muscle Shoals for the past 12 years.

The first section of this bill indicates its general purpose: First, to aid agriculture; and, second, to provide for national defense.

Section 2 authorizes the appointment by the President of a board of three members, fixes their terms and salaries, and provides that they shall be confirmed by the President.

Section 3 is with reference to details about the employment of clerical help.

Section 4 provides, with the approval of the President, for the leasing of the plant for a period of not more than 50 years.

Section 5 places limitations around the leasing contract so as to require the lessee to manufacture a minimum amount of fertilizer ingredients and also chemicals for use in explosives, or the essential ingredients thereof, in time of war.

The bill further provides that after a period of 18 months has expired in the event no satisfactory lease has been made, for the operation of the plant by the Government, or until a satisfactory lease may be made.

Among other things, the bill provides that the lessee shall manufacture fertilizer ingredients, in form suitable for mixing or for direct application to the soil, which shall be offered for sale to farmers or their authorized purchasing agents under conditions providing for equitable distribution for a profit not exceeding 8 per cent of the cost of production and sale.

I have not the time to discuss the other provisions of the bill in detail. It is the fertilizer provision in which I am primarily interested.

The estimated expenditure of our Government in this plant at Muscle Shoals is approximately $140,000,000. I think it is indefensible for Congress not to take some action looking to the better utilization of this plant. As it is, the plant is deteriorating. Its upkeep is an expense to the Government. It should be utilized to the very best advantage. Its location on the Tennessee River in Alabama is an advantage to a great area of the country. I repeat that my chief interest in this bill is in the fertilizer requirement.

As our country grows older more fertilizer is required to make farming productive. A few years ago comparatively little fertilizer was used. To-day, except in the river valleys, fertilizer is or should be used in increasing quantities. In my State we are only beginning the use of it. In practically every Southern State it must be used if there is to be any satisfactory crop return. We use it largely in my State in connection with our potato crops. However, all uplands throughout the entire country could be made much more productive by the use of fertilizer.

It is well known, of course, that effort is made for the fertilization of soil through the rotation of crops, and this is being done everywhere regardless of the use of fertilizer. This should and will be continued.

The farmers of the country have been on the ragged edge of despair for the past 10 or 12 years. Practically all of them are broke. The depression met and overwhelmed them more than 10 years ago. As a result their lands were first mortgaged and later foreclosed so that there is a large part of the acreage in the hands of absentee ownership to-day.

This reminds me of a story which a farmer friend of mine told me. He said 20 years ago he owned a valuable bottom farm, that 10 years thereafter he mortgaged it and only had an equity in it, at the present time the mortgage had been foreclosed, and now he had only a memory of it.

During this last crop season wheat sold for 25 cents per bushel at harvest time; corn sold for 18 to 20 cents per bushel at gathering time; oats from 12 to 15 cents per bushel at threshing time; cotton at 1½ cents per pound; and other farm products and livestock of all kinds were on the same ruinously low-price level. All were and still are selling below the cost of production. As a result the farmers are unable to meet their obligations, and they can not pay their taxes. Their purchasing power is gone and all business is affected. Farming is the basic industry in many States, including my own, upon which every character of business depends. Thousands of farmers have left their farms for cities and towns in search of employment. As a result, there are millions in the aggregate in the cities and towns unemployed and clamoring for something to do.

I am not overdrawing this picture. It is an unpleasant one to paint. There is an unrest throughout the country that beggars description. Congress is being appealed to for all kinds of relief legislation.

I know conditions on the farm. I was born on the farm and grew up to young manhood on the farm. I own much farm land to-day. I say to you that conditions on the farm have been next to intolerable for more than 10 years. These conditions in the past three or four years have reached the commercial centers.

We have been begging and urging legislation for the benefit of the farmers for several years. Our pleadings fell upon deaf ears. The legislation proposed, and which I supported, was vetoed or killed by threatened veto. Congress finally enacted a bill creating a Farm Board with broad powers, and gave the board a revolving fund of $500,000,000. This board has brought no effective relief. Its principal duty is in making loans to cooperative associations, and aside from the encouragement of cooperative marketing and the sympathetic study of farming conditions, this board has not brought the relief that the friends of the act anticipated.

This bill will materially aid agriculture by making it imperative for the lessee to produce fertilizer and to sell it to the farmers at a minimum cost. It will aid them because the plant is located in a farming section. Freight rates to nearby States will not be prohibitive. Of course, the importers of Chilean nitrate and German potash and the fertilizer manufacturers of America, who sell fertilizer at a prohibitive profit, and the power interests, are opposed to this bill. We should enact this legislation in behalf of the individual depressed farmer. It is for him that I speak. Now, how will it help him? If fertilizer can be produced in quantity and at a price that will enable it to be sold and utilized by the farmer so as to develop the products of the farm, of course, it lessens the cost of production to that extent. If the farmer can double the crop yield upon a given acre, at a minimum cost for fertilizer, it makes his farm that much more productive.

There should be additional legislation which will aid him in securing a better market for his products, but that involves questions foreign to this bill. The tariff has measurably destroyed the foreign market. The debenture plan, vetoed by the President, would have made the tariff applicable to farm products. The equalization fee plan would have brought the benefits of cooperation to all. However, if the farmers, through cheap fertilizer, would be able to raise twice as much cotton, corn, wheat, oats, and potatoes, it would result in his direct benefit. For this reason I favor the utilization of this plant. In time of war the plant could and would be used to manufacture chemical ingredients used in making explosives.

It is urged that it will involve an additional expenditure of money. We already have $140,000,000 invested in the plant. Shall we permit the plant, with that investment, to deteriorate and go unused, when with but a small additional investment it can be utilized to the advantage of 6,500,000 farmers throughout the country? It will not put the Government in business. It is already in it, and this will utilize and protect its investment.

When farming is made more attractive, the people will return to the farms from the cities and towns, and it will relieve the unemployment situation. Farm values will return. It will help business. At present prices for farm products the people are unable to live on farms and meet their obligations, pay their taxes, clothe and feed their children, and for the past 10 years people have been compelled to abandon the farms.

This bill protects the Government through a board appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and any lease made by the board must be approved by the President. I think the other provisions fairly protect the Government as well as the surrounding counties, cities, and towns, in the purchase of power from the plant, because the power not used in connection with the plant will not be sold to a power monopoly or trust, but is to be sold by the board at the switchboard, on an equitable basis to municipalities, counties, and States, and the manufacturers of chemical products, preference being given in the order named. In my judgment it is false economy to permit this plant to go unused, and for that reason it is my purpose to support this bill.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 1, strike out section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of War and the Secretary of Commerce are hereby constituted a board, and said board is hereby authorized to carry out the provisions of this act."

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is adopted, I shall offer an amendment to section 3 striking out the provision for offices and office equipment, the employment of officers, attorneys, and agents, and the fixing of their compensation.

Let us consider the situation. We have a plant for which Congress has expended $140,000,000. It was constructed in war times. It is depreciated and obsolete in many particulars. Perhaps the fair market value of the property to-day is not over forty to fifty million dollars, about the cost of one battleship. What do we propose to do? In order to lease that we propose to appoint a board of three members at $10,000 each and authorize them to get headquarters, office furniture, attorneys, stenographers, agents, messengers, and clerks, and so forth. Without reference to what your view may be on this bill, is that necessary? We propose in this bill, if possible, to lease this plant, and we give the board 18 months in which to do it. For the first 18 months there will not be anything for the board to do except to negotiate a lease. The Secretary of War and the other officials of the Government have been in close touch with this question for 10 or 15 years. They have all of the facts. They are in a position to make a lease if it is possible to make one, without any additional expense to the Government. If at the end of 18 months they have not been able to make a lease and the Government should decide to operate the plant, there will have been one session of Congress, and by the time the 18 months expire we will be in the second session of Congress. Gentlemen, without reference to what your opinion on this bill is, but simply in the interest of economy, there is no useful purpose in creating this board. Leasing property of the amount involved is only a minor item, compared with the other items of our Government. It would be unthinkable to appoint a special committee to deal with something amounting to a half million dollars. There is no reason that justifies the Government at this time, when we are striving for economy, to create a new board and commission. These Cabinet officers are appointed by the President, the same as the proposed board provided for in this bill will be appointed. I can not see where my amendment will have any bearing at all upon the whole question except to save some money.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLADAY. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Aside from this objection, does the gentleman favor the general provisions of the bill?

Mr. HOLADAY. I do not know whether I favor all of them or not. I have not made up my mind. I may possibly vote for the bill. I will be much more inclined to vote for the bill with this board cut out and this expense saved.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In other words, the gentleman has not reached any conclusion after studying the bill as to whether or not he thinks it desirable to defeat or to pass it, except that he does object to this particular board.

Mr. HOLADAY. Yes; I object to that. I do not see that my amendment has any bearing on the final disposition of the bill. It does not change the effect of it, except that it saves some money.

Mr. McSWAIN. Does not the gentleman realize that if these Cabinet officers constitute the administrative board, they personally will not give any attention to it, but some subordinate officer, a captain or lieutenant, in the War Department, and some subordinate officers of the other departments will do the work, and the real interest of agriculture and of national defense will suffer by reason of their not being in the hands of men who concentrate direct thought on the subject?

Mr. HOLADAY. I do not agree with the gentleman. I agree with him halfway. No doubt a great deal of the work will be done by subordinates in the department, but they will be doing it in the name of the department and the department will be responsible. The interest of the farmers and everyone else will be protected, and it will save a lot of money.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. One of the objections made by President Hoover in his veto a year ago was with reference to the amount of pay that was provided in that bill for the board, which was $50 per diem, limited to $7,500 for the first year and $5,000 annually thereafter. The President objected and based his veto message in part on that provision, because he said that three men able to conduct a $150,000,000 business could not be found to meet these specifications and I submit that the Secretary of War, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Commerce, with the multitude of duties thrust upon them, each of them holding many different and important offices in the various bureaus and branches of the Government, can not possibly be expected to give the technical, business administration to this $150,000,000 proposition as could three men appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate—men who on account of business and technical experience in the power and fertilizer industry will know what to do. I submit that if this amendment should be agreed to, the whole matter will be delegated to some office boys in these various departments, and that the interest of the taxpayers will suffer.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETTENGILL. Yes.

Mr. HOLADAY. The gentleman must bear in mind that there is no possibility of Congress operating this plant until 18 months from the 1st of next July.

Mr. PETTENGILL. But, as the gentleman from Alabama stated, two and a half million dollars' worth of power goes over the dam now each year for which the taxpayers are getting nothing at all.

Mr. HOLADAY. This board can not do anything about operating until 18 months from next July. This board will not have anything to do with that.

Mr. PETTENGILL. But that power lease is subject to cancellation on 30 days' notice.

We want men in charge of this matter who will look after the power that is going to waste. At the present time there is $2,500,000 worth of power each year going to waste. It is under a temporary 30-day cancellable lease.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HOLADAY) there were ayes 38 and noes 71.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SUMMERS of Washington: Page 2, line 10, strike out the period and add a semicolon and the words "Provided, That all salaries established under this section, in excess of $2,500 per annum, shall be reduced 11 per cent during the fiscal year 1933."

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take the time of the committee in discussing this. The amendment is simply offered to bring it in harmony with the action of the House on yesterday.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I am not authorized to speak for the committee, but speaking for myself—and I think it would be the sentiment of most of the committee—we would not resist an amendment of that nature.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. The board is authorized to provide suitable offices and office equipment, to employ and fix the compensation of such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents as it shall deem necessary for the transaction of the business of the board, without regard to the provisions of other laws applicable to the employment and compensation of officers or employees of the United States, to define their authority and duties, to require bonds of them and fix the penalties thereof, and to dismiss such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents, and to complain and to defend in any court of competent jurisdiction, State or Federal, but only for the enforcement of contracts herein authorized and for the defense and protection of the property of the United States herein intrusted to their care and control. Each member of the board and such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents as the board shall require shall take an oath faithfully to discharge the duties imposed upon them, which oath shall be filed with the board. The board shall organize by the election of a chairman and a vice chairman. Two members of the board shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. The board shall keep a record of its proceedings and shall report from time to time either orally or in writing to the President as he shall require and shall make a written annual report, which shall be transmitted by the President to the Congress.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PARKER of Georgia: Page 2, line 13, after the word "agents," insert a comma and the words "not to exceed the sum of $10,000 per annum for any one individual."

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to limit the salary.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, the committee has no objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. I just wanted to state that the purpose of this amendment is to limit the salary of any one individual who may be employed down there to $10,000 a year. If we can not get them for that, it is better to leave them off.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Some of us have been laboring with this question of Muscle Shoals for the last 10 or 12 years. I am sure the committee acted in absolute good faith and did the very best they could under the circumstances. We find some opposition here by gentlemen who say that the bill goes too far. We are certainly in a very strange predicament. We do not feel the bill goes far enough. I, for one, have repeatedly stated, and I am sure there can be no misunderstanding as to my position on the Muscle Shoals question, that I believe this is the most priceless piece of property owned by the American people; and I, for one, do not want to see it leased at any time to anyone. [Applause.] I hope the committee may meet us halfway in section 14 and reduce the 18 months' period, and I would consent to that only in the hope that when it gets to the other body we will have a pure, unadulterated Government operation bill. [Applause.]

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. How about the 50-year term?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Oh, that is a pretty long time for a young man like the gentleman from Maryland; but for us older fellows 50 years is a long time, and I would like to be here to see what will happen at Muscle Shoals.

Mr. LEWIS. How about 10 years?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Well, 10 years would be much better than 50 years, of course. However, let us review the legislative history of this. On two different occasions we have passed a proper Muscle Shoals bill, and on two different occasions we were confronted with a veto. The last time we did not even have an opportunity to express ourselves on the veto. I hope that if this Congress passes a real Muscle Shoals bill—and I do not hesitate to say that I refer to the Norris bill—let us pass it in time so that if the President vetoes it, the Congress can express itself on that veto.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. PETTENGILL. The gentleman appreciates that the board is not obliged to lease it for 50 years? It is for a period not to exceed 50 years.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But who is going to appoint the board?

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. Does the gentleman think this is a pure, unadulterated Government operation bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will let the gentleman answer that. The gentleman is a member of the committee and I am not.

Mr. GOSS. Well, I do not. I was asking the gentleman what he thought about it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not think it is.

Mr. GOSS. Then I take it the gentleman is not for the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is the gentleman for it?

Mr. GOSS. No; not in its present form.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then either the gentleman or I am wrong. I am for Government operation of this plant. The gentleman is opposed to it, and we are both opposed to the bill.

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then there is something wrong with the bill.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. McSWAIN. The gentleman has often heard it said that truth lies between two extremes, has he not?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not when you are talking about power in this country. We must be on our guard, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GOSS. Does the gentleman think that we could have operation of power alone under this bill as it is written?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Surplus power.

Mr. GOSS. Not even surplus power.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In all frankness, I have stated that I am opposed to the bill. What is the gentleman's objection?

Mr. GOSS. My objection is to section 14. I am opposed to Government operation.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In any form, shape, or manner?

Mr. GOSS. No. The jurisdiction of this committee has nothing to do with this bill as a power proposition. It can only legislate in connection with fertilizer.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And nitrates.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. As the bill came out of the committee, Government operation is merely authorized as far as surplus water power is concerned.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In the meantime the plant is practically idle. We should utilize it.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SUMMERS of Washington: On page 3, line 10, after the word "Congress," insert: "Provided, That all salaries established under this section in excess of $2,500 per annum shall be reduced 11 per cent during the fiscal year 1933."

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, this is simply an effort to place all employees on the same basis.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, these employees can not possibly be employed until after 18 months' time has passed.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I could not understand the gentleman.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. I say it would not be possible to employ these particular employees until after a period of 18 months.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to put all employees under the same regulations or limitations established by the action of the House. There is nothing inharmonious in what I am offering. It is offered in good faith, and is a provision which I think should be carried in order to make this bill conform with the action taken by the House on yesterday.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The exemption enacted by the House yesterday was $2,500, not $2,000.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. My amendment reads "$2,500," unless the Clerk misread it. It is in harmony with the action taken by the House on yesterday.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard briefly in opposition to the gentleman's amendment. We made a mess of a so-called economy bill yesterday. Let us not tack the errors of the economy bill onto every piece of legislation we enact. In all likelihood, Mr. Chairman, that economy bill will be rewritten sometime, or perhaps it will die a natural death. Personally, I believe as we get into the period of inflation the sponsors of the economy bill, and the House, will see the folly of a wage reduction at this time.

I plead with the gentleman from Washington with great earnestness, let us not go crazy over this proposition and tack it on this bill.

Let me say to the gentleman that if the economy bill becomes a law it is applicable to those who may be employed under this legislation also, so there is no necessity for the adoption of this amendment. Let us vote down the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to support this Muscle Shoals bill and also express the hope that no lessee will be found in the stipulated period in the bill, in order that we may have a practical demonstration of the success of public ownership of a great power plant.

The advocates of private ownership disregard the great success of the Government ownership and operation of a great public utility, the Panama Canal; and if we can get the same kind of able management, free from political control of other Government operations, I believe the prejudices against Government ownership would be overcome.

While I am not in favor of the Government's going into business generally—I think it is most undesirable—yet I do believe that in great hydroelectric plants Government ownership would be most advantageous. Already we practically have been dispossessed of our great natural resources, except hydroelectric power to be developed on our great streams. For instance, in my own State of Oregon, we have in the Columbia River the greatest undeveloped hydroelectric power in the world—it is the greatest power stream in the world.

Under our present laws and policies it would be practically impossible for private interests to come in and develop those great resources properly. It would be impossible to raise the enormous capital required, and yet the full growth of the great Northwest awaits development of this latent power now going to waste.

I believe the Government operation of Muscle Shoals will furnish an example which will justify the Government in building these great hydroelectric dams on such streams as the Columbia River.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. The board is hereby authorized, with the approval of the President, to lease in whole for a period not exceeding 50 years from the date of the enactment of this act upon such terms and conditions as, in its judgments but subject to the limitations of this act, will best serve the interests of the United States and carry out the purposes of this act, the Government-owned properties located at and near Muscle Shoals, Ala. (except the power plants and power-generating facilities), including nitrate plants

Nos. 1 and 2 and the Waco limestone quarry, together with all real estate, tools and machinery, equipment, accessories, and materials connected therewith, and all appurtenances thereto, but excepting the locks and other navigation facilities: Provided, That no part of the aforementioned properties shall be leased or subleased to any power-distributing company or to any holding company or other company affiliated or allied with any power-distributing company.

It shall be the duty of the board to administer the provisions of this act and to supervise and enforce full performance of the obligations of contracts made thereunder.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GREEN: On page 4, line 3, after the period, insert the following:

"Provided further, That the board shall not enter into any lease with any person, firm, or corporation with which any member of the board is associated, affiliated, or allied, or is a stockholder, officer, or employee."

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will accept this amendment. This is a very important bill. Any bill that will save $107,000,000 a year to the farmers of our country is, indeed, an important bill. The statement that this bill will do that, it appears, is without contradiction. If we desire to carry farm relief to the farmers who are in many cases obtaining less than a dollar a day for their labor, I believe we should be very cautious in the framing of the legislation. We do not desire to have any scandal go out to the world in connection with the leasing and operation of Muscle Shoals. How well do we remember the Daugherty, Fall, Sinclair, and other questionable Government transactions.

In offering this amendment I do not wish to reflect upon the integrity of anyone who will be appointed as a member of this board but desire to protect them from questionable entanglements, criticisms, and temptations.

After all, the members of this board will be human, and you will find that perhaps the members of this board will be inclined to give ear to their old business associates and companies.

Gentlemen on this side of the aisle recall the experiences which have been had in the Treasury Department recently in the matter of giving tax refunds. Possibly they were lawful and possibly the law was strained, but no harm can be done by including this amendment and forever taking away from the members of this board the temptation to enter into leases with their own firms, corporations, and business associates.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. Is the gentleman fearful that some members of the Alabama Power Co. may get on that board?

Mr. GREEN. I have reference to no individual, because I have no idea whom the President is going to appoint on this board.

Mr. HORR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. HORR. As one who knows something about it, would it be possible to conceive that the people who control this power situation would ever enter into a lease until they have it brought to their attention that if they do not do it the Government itself will take it over?

Mr. GREEN. It is very obvious that there will be those desiring to be appointed on the board who are connected with the power companies and with the fertilizer industry.

Mr. HORR. You would have the same condition prevailing down there with reference to the power situation that we find in connection with the power companies in our section, where in financing those institutions they ordinarily use $1 about four times, and then for the purpose of taxation they will submit their valuation at about one-fifth of the amount and go to the public utilities commission with such a statement, where the rates are made.

Mr. GREEN. I am glad to have that information from the gentleman. I hope the membership of this House will include this amendment in the bill, even if we have to do it on a motion to recommit, because in carrying out the purposes of this bill I believe all temptation should be removed from gentlemen who are to be appointed on the board. We do not know. The President may sign the bill or it may be passed over his veto, but at any rate it is obvious that sooner or later Muscle Shoals will be operated either by the Government or by individuals, so that the enormous expenditure which our Government has made there will not continue to go over the dam and to the benefit of no one. I hope my amendment will be adopted.

Too long have the American farmers been forced to pay tribute to the fertilizer barons. This tribute is going largely to foreigners and foreign monopolies. It must cease. America can produce her own fertilizer ingredients at Muscle Shoals, and with American money and American labor and for American farmers at a price far reduced; our farmers must obtain fertilizer more cheaply. This bill will bring this result. Twice we have passed it only to have two Republican Presidents veto it. If President Hoover vetoes it, we must pass it over his veto.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Whether it is President Hoover, a Republican, or whether it will be a Democrat after next March 4, I am that patriotically inclined that I do not think the man who will occupy that high office will select men to lease this property who are influenced by any private or ulterior motives. Nor would I cast any reflection upon the Senate of the United States by suggesting that whatever may be the politics of the President who appoints these members, they would confirm any person who is not fit and worthy to fill the high position of trust that is sought to be conferred upon them.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. GREEN. I am wondering whether the gentleman is aware of recent revelations as to appointees that have been sent to the Senate for confirmation?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am aware of the fact that the Senate of the United States, democratically controlled as it is, has confirmed the appointees of the President of the United States. I do not think that any Member of this House should submit a proposal of this character, which casts a reflection not only upon the high office of President but upon the Senate of the United States, which has to confirm the men recommended by the President.

I can not conceive of anything else than that the amendment was offered for home consumption. It seems to me the only purpose of the proposal is to suggest that the men who will have charge of leasing this $150,000,000 proposition will debase themselves to the extent that they will enter into a contract under which they will become beneficiaries. That is beyond my comprehension. I have more faith in humankind than the gentleman from Florida, the sponsor of this amendment.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. TABER. Is it not true that any such thing as this is covered by the general statutes anyway?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes. There is nothing in the recent history of governmental affairs which would lead anybody to believe there would be any basis for the suggestion contained in this proposal, whether the President be a Democrat or a Republican.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, it would be sufficient for me to oppose this bill at this time if it were only that its passage would entail a tremendous expense on the Treasury, which I do not believe ought to be incurred at this time. There are, however, other and stronger reasons.

It is true this Muscle Shoals problem has been kicking about the Halls of Congress for many years, and, for one, I should like to have it disposed of. I should be glad to see this great potentiality utilized for beneficial purposes. I should be rejoiced to know that it is to be henceforth made to serve the best interests of the people in the two great States of Tennessee and Alabama to whom it properly belongs. The bill that is presented here, however, will not, in my judgment, serve the desired purpose or solve the problem as it ought to be solved. As it seems to me, it is neither fish, flesh, fowl, nor good red herring. It is not sufficiently committed to Government operation to satisfy the honest gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], who says that the kind of bill he wants is a straight undisguised Government-operation proposition. It certainly does not please those who are opposed to Government operation of utilities, because they believe that hidden way back in the woodpile, and not very far back, either, is a provision which practically insures Government operation.

I think the persons who, in good faith, really desire the leasing of this property were certainly asleep at the switch when the bill was written if they ever had supposed that a lease would be secured under the terms of the bill. If there were genuine desire to lease the property, terms under which it could be leased would have been provided in the bill, and no strings would have been tied to it. There would be no occasion whatever for hitching on section 14, which is the provision for Government ownership, if a lease were what is desired, because before the 18 months will have rolled around the Congress will be in session again, so that if it has not been leased, Congress can then take it up and then if deemed wise proceed by direct legislation to provide for Government operation.

It seems to me that this bill is, as I started to say, adroitly drawn, but I withdraw that and say it is cleverly though patently drawn for the purpose of making it impossible to lease this property and thus by negation bring about the result actually sought—Government operation. After having made it impossible to lease by the terms contained in the bill, the bill then provides that the property must be operated by the Government. This makes a hard and fast case. Having provided that in the event you can not lease you must operate, then it is only necessary to make the conditions such that no reasonable man in his senses under such conditions would attempt to take a lease of the property, and you have arrived at the desired goal—complete Government operation.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman state the impossible terms that he has in mind?

Mr. TILSON. In the first place, the requirements in regard to the amounts of fertilizer to be produced under the conditions imposed.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. We heard from another gentleman on your side who is very much in favor of a lease that we make that provision stricter in its requirements. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD] wanted to go much further than this provision in such requirements.

Mr. TILSON. Well, I do not believe that the provisions now in the bill are such that anybody could possibly accept them and make this an economical commercial proposition.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. GOSS. I was just going to call the attention of the gentleman to that portion of the bill on page 5, with respect to fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients unsold for six months or more, as the market demands. The bill does not even allow a reasonable carrying charge.

Mr. TILSON. I think anyone who will read the bill through will conclude that the real purpose of the bill, somewhat thinly veiled, is to make it so that this property can not be leased under the conditions imposed and thereby bring about Government operation. If it be honestly desired to lease the property, if that is the real purpose, then there is no need for section 14. If a lease is what is wanted, all that is necessary is to provide reasonable conditions for a lease; and if one is not secured within a reasonable time, then by a bill considered on its merits proceed to either provide for Government ownership or make such other disposition of the property as may then seem best. In all fairness we should not, under the guise of authorizing a lease of property, attach provisions that in effect make leasing impossible and Government operation both mandatory and obligatory.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. In addition to usual and necessary covenants (including such terms as shall adequately protect both the investment and property of the lessee and the interests of the United States), lease contracts shall contain covenants giving effect to the following provisions:

(1) Such power as may be necessary and such lands, buildings, fixtures, and other equipment belonging to the United States at and near Muscle Shoals, Ala., as may be serviceable for the production of fertilizer and/or fertilizer ingredients shall be used for the production of fertilizer and/or fertilizer ingredients in form suitable for quantity production or for home mixing or for direct application to the soil. The lessee may modify, change, and improve such plants and construct other plants and use the same for the general purposes declared by this act.

(3) In computing cost of production there shall be included not exceeding 6 per cent interest per annum on any capital invested by the lessee in improvements to existing plants or in additional plants, and amortization on an equitable basis of the cost of such improvements and such additional plants used in the manufacture of fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients, and not exceeding 6 per cent per annum on working capital used in connection with the manufacture of fertilizer and/or fertilizer ingredients; and a reasonable actual carrying charge (exclusive of 8 per cent profit thereon) on the stocks of such fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients as are held in storage and unsold for six months or more as the market demands, as herein provided shall be satisfied: Provided, That there shall not be included as a part of the cost of producing such fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients any royalty for use by the lessee of any patent, patent right, or patented process belonging on the date of the lease to the lessee or in which the lessee has any interest, or belonging to any subsidiary or allied corporation, or belonging to or controlled by any officer or agent of the lessee or of any such allied or subsidiary corporation; but if the lessee should make expenditures in the development of any patent, or should buy any patent, patent right, or patented process with the hope or expectation of thereby reducing the cost of such fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients, and/or of processing the same for agricultural purposes as aforesaid, then such sum of money as shall be so expended or paid by the lessee shall be considered and treated in the accounting of cost of such fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients as investment in the nature of plant account and not as current expenses, and such expenditures and costs shall be written off on the expiration of any patent or license so developed or acquired. For the annual determination of the cost of such fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients there shall be appointed by the board a production engineer, and by the lessee another production engineer, and by these a firm of certified public accountants, and these three shall proceed to ascertain and compute the cost of producing such fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients; and in the event of any disagreement the said two engineers shall select a third production engineer, who shall hear and consider the contentions and decide the issues, and such decisions shall be binding upon all parties for the year for which the determination shall have been made. A copy of such audit and decision shall be filed each year with the board and by it be preserved. The expenses incident to this provision shall be paid by the lessee and shall be charged as an item in the cost of producing such fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients. If such annual cost determination discloses that purchasers have paid a price for fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients in excess of that allowable under this act, then such excess funds shall be credited to the price of fertilizer during any year thereafter as may be determined by the board, for the purpose (a) of reducing the price to the limit herein prescribed; or (b) of making up any deficit which may occur in any year thereafter in the profit allowed the lessee under the provisions hereof.

(4) The use of the United States properties adapted to the fixation of nitrogen in the manufacture of fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients in time of peace for sale for use in agriculture, and for production of other chemicals, and of explosives or the essential ingredients thereof in time of war: Provided, That the contract for the demise of any such properties for the production of fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients shall contain a stipulation that the operation of any properties used in the manufacture of fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients shall be conducted in an economical manner and that there must be manufactured annually at least a prescribed amount of nitrogenous plant food of a kind and quality and in a form available as plant food and capable of being applied directly to the soil in connection with the growth of crops: And provided further, That the contract shall contain a stipulation requiring the lessee to produce within two years from the date such lease shall become effective, such fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients containing not less than 10,000 tons of fixed nitrogen, and shall require periodic increases in quantity of fixed nitrogen from time to time as the market demands may reasonably require, and such lease shall provide that such increases shall finally reach the maximum production capacity of such plant or plants as the board may find to be economically adapted, or susceptible of being made economically adapted to the fixation of nitrogen, if the reasonable demands of the market shall justify the same, except when the nitrogen produced is required for national defense, or when the market demands for same are satisfied by the maintenance in storage and unsold of such fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients containing at least 2,500 tons of fixed nitrogen, but whenever said stock in storage shall fall below the quantity containing 2,500 tons of fixed nitrogen, the production of such nitrogen, and the manufacture of such fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients shall thereupon be resumed: Provided further, That it shall be the duty of the board to secure by so providing in the contract the production at Muscle Shoals of an initial minimum quantity of phosphoric acid of not less than 15,000 tons in the form of concentrated fertilizer within two years and six months from the date that such production becomes effective. The plant capacity required for the production of such initial minimum quantity shall be increased from time to time and operated in response to the reasonable market demand until such plant capacity shall be sufficient for the annual production of not less than 40,000 tons of phosphoric acid in the form of concentrated fertilizer, and thereafter shall be operated to capacity, subject, however, to the reasonable market demand.

In order to take advantage of any improvements in the chemical art or changes in the demands of fertilizer ingredients, the lessee, with the approval of the board, may make, from time to time, changes and improvements in the fertilizer plants, and construct other plants, and use other processes so long as the lessee produces fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients containing the amount of plant food herein required.

(5) The lessee shall maintain during the term of the lease United States nitrate plant No. 2 in at least the equivalent of the condition in which it shall be turned over to the lessee at the commencement of the lease term in respect of effective capacity for manufacture of ammonium nitrate, available in suitable buildings, until such time as the Congress of the United States shall declare that such maintenance is no longer deemed necessary in the interest of national defense.

(6) The term "fertilizer" shall be understood to mean a fertilizer containing at least nitrogen and phosphoric acid and/or potash.

(7) Power-generating facilities shall be guaranteed and allocated in the capacity required by the lessee for the manufacture of fertilizer and/or fertilizer ingredients and other chemicals, and the board shall supply to the lessee from such capacity, electric energy, and, pending its use by the lessee for such purposes, or when not required, the sale or other disposition shall be made by the board subject to recall at and upon request of the lessee. Electric energy generated by the power-generating facilities not so guaranteed and allocated shall be sold or disposed of by the board at the switchboard on an equitable basis, municipalities, counties, States, and the manufacturers of chemical products to have preference in the order named. Any such power sold to others than those above mentioned shall be subject to recall, after reasonable notice not exceeding 18 months, for the production of fertilizer and/or fertilizer ingredients, or for the use of municipalities, counties, States, or for the manufacture of chemical products.

(8) Rental payments to the United States, and prices charged the lessee and municipalities, counties, States, and manufacturers of chemical products for power shall be fair and reasonable.

(9) The possession, use, operation, maintenance, and control of properties of the United States at or near Muscle Shoals not leased (except the locks and other facilities for navigation) shall be under the general supervision of the board for the administration of the provisions of this act. The Government shall be entitled to receive free of cost sufficient power to operate the navigation facilities at Dams Nos. 1 and 2.

(10) Preference as a lessee under the provisions of this act shall be accorded to States and to nonprofit corporations exclusively owned and controlled by organizations of farmers, and, so far as may be practicable, in the negotiation of any lease, open competition shall be employed after due advertisement.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HILL of Alabama: On page 9, in line 16, strike out subsection (5) section 5 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(5) The lessee shall maintain during the term of the lease equipment for the production of ammonium nitrate in United States nitrate plant No. 2 and/or No. 1, in at least the equivalent of the condition in which such equipment shall be turned over to the lessee at the commencement of the lease term in respect of the effective capacity of nitrate plant No. 2 for the manufacture of ammonium nitrate, available in suitable buildings, until such time as the Congress of the United States shall declare that such maintenance is no longer deemed necessary in the interest of national defense: Provided, That the maintenance cost on such parts of plant No. 2 and/or 1 which are not used by the lessee for production of fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients or for production of other chemicals shall be paid by the board from proceeds derived from rentals and sale of power."

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment deals with ammonium nitrate in plant Nos. 1 and 2, and subsection 5 of the bill refers to nitrate plant No. 2. It has no reference to the making of any chemical. It is not germane, in my opinion, to this section.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. This is what may be termed the national defense section of the bill. It provides that there shall be at Muscle Shoals, until Congress declares otherwise, equipment which will produce the amount of ammonium nitrate which is the capacity of plant No. 2 to-day.

Mr. GOSS. I made my point to the amendment and not on the paragraph. That has nothing to do with national defense.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The bill deals with all property at Muscle Shoals—plant No. 1, plant No. 2, as well as other property. This subsection 5 of section 5 purposes to keep available for the Government the amount of ammonium nitrate which is the capacity of plant No. 2 to-day. Both plants turn out nitrogen, and nitrogen can be converted into ammonium nitrate by carrying the production just two steps further. All the amendment does is to permit the lessee to keep the equipment for the amount of ammonium nitrate in plant No. 1 or plant No. 2, one or both.

Mr. GOSS. My point of order was directed to plant No. 1, because in this section there is no reference to plant No. 1, and therefore the amendment is not germane to the paragraph.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. It does not make any difference that plant No. 1 is not mentioned in the section. The whole purpose and intent of the section is to secure the maintenance of the necessary equipment for the amount of ammonium nitrate. By putting plant No. 1 in here you simply require the lessee to maintain that amount of ammonium nitrate to the capacity of either plant No. 1 or plant No. 2. There is no question about the germaneness.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. GOSS. I have a perfecting amendment.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, all that my amendment does is to permit the lessee under the bill to maintain the equipment which he is required to maintain to have the capacity of 110,000 tons of ammonium nitrate available at any time, either in nitrate plant No. 1 or nitrate plant No. 2, or in both.

The evidence from the experts and the engineers shows that it is entirely possible and perhaps economically feasible to hook up these two plants and tie together their operation. Instead of restricting the equipment required to be maintained to nitrate plant No. 2, let the lessee keep it in one or both.

As far as the proviso in the amendment is concerned, instead of requiring the lessee to maintain that part of the plant or plants at Muscle Shoals which the lessee will not need for nitrogen and which is necessary to turn nitrogen into ammonium nitrate, we allow the board out of the money derived from the sale of power to maintain that part of the plant or plants.

The amendment provides no basic change in the intent or purpose of this section of the bill. The section as carried in the bill provides that the lessee shall maintain this particular plant or plants needed for the national defense, and under this plan the Government would pay the lessee for the maintenance through a cheaper power rate or a cheaper rental. Instead of doing this the proviso in the amendment provides that the board itself, the Government agency, out of the money derived from the power and rental, shall maintain that part of the property.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following perfecting amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Goss: Page 9, line 17, after the word "lease," insert "such equipment in," and in the same line, after the figure "2," insert "as the lessee may find not useful in the manufacture of fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients and other chemicals"; and in line 24, on page 9, strike out the period and insert "in order that the cost of fertilizer may not be burdened with such expense for national defense, the cost of such maintenance shall be paid by the board to the lessee monthly from the proceeds derived from rentals and the sale of power."

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, as I read the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL], he is approaching this matter in one way and I am approaching it in another. One of us is putting it in a positive way and the other in a negative way. I like my amendment better, and the reason for offering these amendments is this. Gentlemen will notice the language:

The lessee shall maintain during the term of the lease United States nitrate plant No. 2 in at least the equivalent of the condition in which it shall be turned over to the lessee at the commencement of the lease term.

If that language of the bill remains, and either one of these amendments is not adopted, it is my judgment that the lessee could not utilize to advantage certain portions of this building that the Government would lease to him, because of this restricted provision that he would have to maintain the plants in at least the same equivalent condition. My amendment proposes, after the word "lease," to include "such equipment in" the nitrate plant numbered 2" as the lessee may find not useful in the manufacture of fertilizer, fertilizer ingredients, and other chemicals." The difference between that amendment and the one offered by the gentleman from Alabama is that he makes his amendment positive by referring only to the ammonium nitrate properties in plants Nos. 1 and 2, while I include all property useful for national defense, even if there is any other, with the exception of that property which is used for fertilizer.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand the gentleman's amendment, if anyone leased this property, he could use all of the plant No. 2 for anything he wanted to in connection with his regular business?

Mr. GOSS. With his fertilizer business.

Mr. SNELL. I mean that.

Mr. GOSS. That is correct.

Mr. SNELL. And the equipment in the plant that he could not use in that connection would be placed to one side?

Mr. GOSS. Absolutely in the interest of national defense.

Mr. SNELL. But it would all be there, and they could use anything necessary to carry on the plant.

Mr. GOSS. The gentleman is correct. And further I amend by the insertion at line 24 of the language:

In order that the cost of fertilizer may not be burdened with such expense for national defense the cost of such maintenance shall be paid by the board to the lessee monthly from the proceeds derived from rental or the sale of power.

While I have no pride of authorship, I honestly think my amendment safeguards the interest of national defense a little more than does the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, because it would include everything except that equipment that was to be used for fertilizer.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I believe both amendments are bad and destroy the representations that have been made as to the purpose and meaning of the bill. If we have Government operation, you would place the burden of maintaining these ammonia plants on the Government. If you are going to lease it out, it is hardly fair to relieve the lessee of this burden. In every bill that has been suggested to date we have always imposed on the lessee the responsibility of maintaining these plants. I submit to the gentleman from Alabama that he destroys the very purpose of his bill if he seeks to relieve the lessee of that burden.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Of course, other bills have required the lessee to maintain these plants.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But the gentleman must remember that in these other bills the lease provided that the lessee should get the power facilities and haul the power and everything else. There is a difference in this bill from most of the so-called leasing bills. In most of them the lessee has gotten all of the power; he has taken the whole thing. We now have this board that is going to keep the power, collect the rentals, fix the price, and if you put this burden on the lessee of keeping the plant he is not using for the manufacture of fertilizer or anything else, he is going to charge it into the cost of his fertilizer.

After these amendments are disposed of, I want to ask the gentleman what he means by 8 per cent, and I have an amendment to offer there.

Mr. SNELL. Plant No. 2 will be used in connection with the general manufacture of fertilizer.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think so.

Mr. SNELL. I think that amendment might go in at least. I think because this bill is on a little different basis than any other lease that has been proposed, it would be no more than fair or right that the Government should make some allowance on the upkeep of that plant which they are not using.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The use of that plant for fertilizer would not destroy its original purpose at all, would it?

Mr. SNELL. Only partly, I should say. They might have to move some machinery.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It would have to be reconverted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. The testimony shows that only one-half of nitrate plant No. 2 is suitable for the manufacture of fertilizer.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. If we should pass or defeat this bill to-day and the stock market goes down again to-morrow because the bankers of this country are not functioning, they would give out and have the press say that the stock market failed because Congress passed this bill, as they did to-day because we passed the bill instructing the Federal reserve system to continue just what they are doing now and which they have been doing for nine weeks and which they should continue to do until we have a reflation of prices.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And that shows, let me say to the gentleman from Kansas, the asininity of these bankers, and their brazenness and lying and misrepresentation. If they have the fears of the Goldsborough bill that they have expressed, then the prices of stocks should go up and not down, because that is an inflation bill and not a deflation bill.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. If the bankers keep on depressing the markets in this country and refusing to perform their proper functions, it may be necessary for the Government to go into the banking business. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And, Mr. Chairman, that comes from the gentleman from Kansas and not from the gentleman from New York. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut as a perfecting amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 36, noes 64.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARE: Page 5, line 1, after the word "exceeding," strike out the figure "8" and insert the figure "6." In line 4, after the word "exceeding," strike out the figure "6" and insert the figure "4." In line 9, after the word "exceeding," strike out the figure "6" and insert the figure "4."

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for the purpose of securing some information from members of the committee.

At the top of page 5, in line 1, it is provided that the lessee shall have a profit of 8 per cent, and in section 3 the bill attempts to outline the cost upon which he may levy that 8 per cent—6 per cent for capital invested in plant; 6 per cent on capital invested in operating expenses; and then a reasonable per cent for carrying charges. The thing I am afraid of is that so much interest and profits will be allowed that the cost of fertilizers will be so high that the prices will not be reduced very much. What I am after is cheaper fertilizer.

I do not know whether I understand this thoroughly or not, but it seems to me that if a lessee is to be guaranteed or allowed 6 per cent on the money he invests in the plant and then 6 per cent on the amount he places into the concern for materials purchased, and then 8 per cent on the gross cost of production, it would be a duplication of profit. In other words, it looks to me as though the lessee will be allowed to charge as much as 14 per cent on the amount of money he has invested in the business.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. I know the gentleman desires to be accurate.

Mr. HARE. I am asking for information.

Mr. GOSS. There is no guaranty of an amount of profit. Whatever he sells, he can sell at a price that would yield him not more than 8 per cent after an audit is made. Further, if the gentleman will read further on page 5, in line 9, he can not receive more than 6 per cent on his working capital used in connection with the manufacture. It is further safeguarded in line 14, because he has not allowed a carrying charge in excess of his original profit on the inventory held in storage and unsold for six months. So I can assure the gentleman there is no chance of doubling up on those profits. I think the gentleman on the other side will agree with me.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The gentleman is absolutely right.

Mr. HARE. The gentleman may be correct; but suppose I were to lease this plant—which would be impossible, because I would not have the money—and I were allowed 6 per cent on the money I used in buying the material and then a reasonable fee for carrying charges and then allowed 6 per cent on operating cost, and then above all of that I am allowed 8 per cent on the total of those costs, it seems to me there would be a duplication in the interest, at least, I am receiving on the amount of capital invested.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. I can assure the gentleman there is no guaranty of any interest. It is a restriction, that he can not charge more than 8 per cent for profit or allow over 6 per cent on any capital investment, and he may sell his entire output at a loss.

Mr. HARE. I know a profit is not guaranteed, but it is allowed, and I am certain he will not sell at a loss.

Mr. GOSS. There is no guaranty, I can assure the gentleman. He is not guaranteed anything.

Mr. HARE. But the point I am making is that if he gets 6 per cent on all investments and then is allowed 8 per cent on that, there is a duplication of interest on the amount of money invested.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. MAY. That 8 per cent is only on the storage carrying charge that is in stock for six months.

Mr. HARE. No. That is on the cost of production. Let me explain what I mean. Suppose the lessee should invest $500,000 in the plant and in the purchase of material he would be allowed to add 6 per cent of this amount, or $30,000 to cost of production, and then he would be allowed as much as 8 per cent on the $30,000, which would certainly be a duplication of interest or profit to the extent of $2,400.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. MONTET. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, for the reasons assigned by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Goss] a moment ago, this amendment should be adopted. There is no guaranty whatever in this bill of 8 per cent on the cost of production and sale nor any guaranty of 6 per cent on capital invested.

As was stated at the beginning of this debate, a great deal of discretion has been left with the board and a great deal of responsibility has been placed in the board. These various rates, the rate of profit to be earned, the rate of interest to be permitted on capital invested, and the rate of interest on working capital, are maximum rates that would vary according to circumstances. They would vary according to conditions, and would be regulated by the board. There is no duplication of profits at all in the various provisions of subsection 3. There is a maximum of 8 per cent profit permitted on production and sale.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTET. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. There is positively no guaranty of any profit whatever, is there?

Mr. MONTET. Positively none whatever. These are just maximum limitations to be left to the discretion of the board.

Mr. SNELL. It would be impossible for a man to get capital to put into the business at a less rate of interest than 6 per cent.

Mr. MONTET. He could not get capital to invest in a new building, for instance, unless he paid interest on the money he borrowed. That is an investment; that is not a part of his cost of production and sale. A new building would be a capital investment.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTET. I yield.

Mr. HARE. The bill states, on page 5, that in computing the cost of production certain factors only shall be considered.

Mr. MONTET. That is true. They are not duplications at all. We do not allow the lessee 8 per cent on capital invested and also 6 per cent on capital invested. Those are two separate items entirely. The 8 per cent to be earned is on production and sale. The 6 per cent he is entitled to is on capital investments, such as the erection of a new building. That is there permanently. He is also permitted to charge up to 6 per cent on operating capital. That, for instance, would be money borrowed to meet pay rolls and things of that kind.

These items are items that are always carried in any and all well-regulated business establishments in this country, and they can not operate otherwise.

Mr. MAY. These two rates are maximum rates, and the lessee can not go beyond them.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER: On page 7, line 23, after the colon, strike out all down to and including the word "resumed" on page 8, line 19, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "And provided further, That the contract shall contain a stipulation requiring the lessee to be equipped to produce fixed nitrogen in such quantity as the board shall deem necessary."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, the trouble with this bill is that there are some provisions in it which absolutely prevent any lessee from successfully operating this plant. The investigations which the leading farm organizations of this country have made into this situation developed that nitrogen, instead of being something that is hard to get, is at the present time a drug on the market. If you load up your lease with a requirement that the lessee shall produce large quantities of fixed nitrogen he can not at the present time, with market conditions as they are now and perhaps will be, produce fixed nitrogen or nitrogen necessary for the manufacture of fertilizer at a profit. He is obliged to do it at a loss, and it will practically prevent the successful operation of this plant for that purpose.

My amendment provides that the lessee shall be equipped to make fixed nitrogen in such quantities as the board shall determine, so it will give the board an opportunity to draw such a lease that if the leading farm organizations should form a cooperative and go into the proposition and lease the plant they would have a chance to operate it successfully.

It is ridiculous for us to go ahead and pass a leasing provision here which is so drawn that it is absolutely impossible to work under it. My amendment, as far as your nitrogen proposition is concerned, would cure that defect. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. I call the gentleman's attention to page 9, line 4, where the lessee is required to produce not less than 40,000 tons of phosphoric acid. Why does the gentleman simply pick on nitrogen when the lessee is required to make 40,000 tons of phosphoric acid?

Mr. TABER. Because I am taking one thing at a time. I think that is the way to perfect the bill.

Mr. GOSS. It is in the same subsection.

Mr. TABER. But it is not in the same proviso. I think we ought to correct one thing at a time. If the gentleman is prepared to present the question, in so far as phosphoric acid is concerned, I think he should do it at the time that item is reached.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. MAY. As I caught the gentleman's amendment, he is objecting to the proviso beginning on page 7, which requires the contract to contain a stipulation providing that the lessee shall produce within two years from the date of the lease certain stipulated quantities of nitrogen?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman will find in lines 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, on page 8, that it shall not be less than 10,000 tons of fixed nitrogen—and shall require periodic increases in quantity of fixed nitrogen from time to time as the market demands may reasonably require.

Does not the gentleman think that it is within the power of the board to specify the quantities as the market requires?

Mr. TABER. No; because it requires that the lessee shall produce not less than 10,000 tons of fixed nitrogen within two years, and, of course, it permits him in the future to go on and do it. My amendment permits him to do what the board might think is reasonable, while the bill as it is drawn puts a very heavy burden on the lessee, and one which the lessee ought not to be required to maintain.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman does not think that the language—and shall require periodic increases in quantity of fixed nitrogen from time to time as the market demands may reasonably require—would do that?

Mr. TABER. No; because my amendment provides that the lessee shall be equipped to manufacture nitrogen in such quantities as the board may determine necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask a question of the chairman of the committee. On page 5, lines 14 and 15, where the bill computes the cost of the product, why should not the lessee be allowed interest on stock in his storehouse even though it is five months instead of six months? That is a carrying charge.

Mr. McSWAIN. I will state to the gentleman that the fertilizer business is seasonal. Fertilizer is bought and used in the spring of the year and in the fall of the year, so that there is an intervening length of time of about six months. Now, in order that the lessee may be protected against an unreasonable length of time, a storage charge is allowed for the carrying of his commodity in storage. However, it is the desire of those who believe this bill promises much to agriculture that the minimum burden may be put upon the price so that the fertilizer may be as cheap as possible. Now, in order to encourage the lessee to make as much as the market will absorb but not to encourage the lessee to keep unnecessary quantities in storage, so that he may charge thereby, this limitation of six months was placed in the bill. Originally the limitation was 12 months.

Mr. SNELL. As a matter of fact, the gentleman will agree it would cost him just as much for the first six months as it would cost him the next six months.

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. And would not that be a legitimate charge against the cost of his product?

Mr. McSWAIN. If these buildings were erected by the lessee there might be much force in the argument of the gentleman, but I submit that the buildings that are there will go under the leased contract, very naturally, for very little, if anything at all.

Mr. SNELL. I understand; but you are going to go over the cost and audit the entire cost of this product.

Mr. McSWAIN. Exactly.

Mr. SNELL. So that will all go into the cost, and he can not take any advantage of that. It seems to me that this would be a legitimate charge against the cost of production; and that is all I am asking.

Mr. McSWAIN. We think, too, it is a legitimate charge.

Mr. SNELL. Then why not cut out that six months entirely and let him have the right to have the interest on the product figured on the full length of time?

Mr. McSWAIN. We thought that there must be a certain minimum on everything; a maximum on the interest charge and a minimum on the commodity and a minimum on the time.

Mr. SNELL. But the gentleman says the cost would be exactly the same, and it would certainly cost just as much for the first six months as the next six months.

Mr. McSWAIN. But it will not be in storage the first six months. It will be in process of manufacture, and as soon as it comes out of the factory it will be sold and will be loaded in the cars.

Mr. SNELL. That is true; but when it is stored 5 months and 29 days, he can not get any credit whatever for it.

Mr. McSWAIN. That is true.

Mr. SNELL. Although it costs him just the same.

Mr. McSWAIN. Oh, our friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] said we should not fix a minimum on the amount of production, to wit, 10,000 tons for the first two years, but the committee in its wisdom has always felt there must be certain minimum and certain maximum limitations fixed by statute.

Mr. SNELL. I agree with that, but I can not see any real, consistent reason why the man should not have the right to put in the cost of his product the cost of storing the first six months the same as the last six months.

Mr. McSWAIN. Logically——

Mr. SNELL. Logically, that is true, is it not?

Mr. McSWAIN. As between two business men, the gentleman is correct.

Mr. SNELL. Is not this a business proposition all the way through?

Mr. McSWAIN. It is, but here is also a Government statutory authorization which seeks to fix certain minimum and maximum boundaries within which the lease may be made and we felt in order to protect the Government and in order to stiffen the backs of the negotiators this is necessary.

Mr. SNELL. But the gentleman wants to write a lease under which some one can put his money in this proposition, does he not?

Mr. McSWAIN. Absolutely.

Mr. SNELL. And the gentleman admits I am right logically. Why will the gentleman not accept an amendment to strike out those lines?

Mr. McSWAIN. I regret that I am not authorized by the committee to agree to any such amendment.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, in line 14, page 5, after the word "unsold," insert a colon and strike out the balance of the line and line 15.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SNELL: Page 5, line 14, after the word "unsold," insert a colon and strike out the words "for six months or more, as the market demands, as herein provided shall be satisfied."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say just one word. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN] has admitted that, logically, I am correct, and there is no real reason why the man who leases this plant should not be allowed to put the cost of storage for the first six months in the cost of the product, the same as the last six months or any period exceeding six months. For this reason I have offered the amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment, and may I have the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL]?

Paragraph 3 first provides 6 per cent interest on capital invested, and that, of course, is normal and reasonable. Then it provides 6 per cent interest per annum on the working capital. The working capital in all likelihood is included in the capital invested.

Mr. GOSS. Oh, no.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But assuming it is not, then as to what you borrow outside, the cost of such money is a reasonable charge against the cost involved.

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not see why they fix that at 6 per cent. The storage also is a proper charge against the cost of production.

Mr. SNELL. That is what I thought.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not see why, then, it is fixed at 8 per cent.

Mr. SNELL. It is not fixed at 8 per cent; it is exclusive of 8 per cent.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exclusive of 8 per cent profit, and is not that 8 per cent profit a turnover?

Mr. SNELL. Oh, no; that is on the whole business.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is that 8 per cent plus the 6 per cent on the investment?

Mr. SNELL. It has nothing to do with that whatever.

Mr. GOSS. And there is no guaranty.

Mr. SNELL. It means that there is no possibility of that going beyond 8 per cent.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then is the 6 per cent included in the 8 per cent?

Mr. GOSS. Oh, no.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But 6 per cent is provided on the capital invested. Is that right?

Mr. GOSS. That is true.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And 6 per cent is provided on the working capital in addition.

Mr. GOSS. Yes; but it may be the same.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then he would get 12 per cent.

Mr. GOSS. No; if the gentleman will read the language very carefully, it provides that, including cost of production, there shall be included not exceeding 6 per cent on any capital invested. That is not invested capital.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No. He gets 6 per cent on the physical plant he puts in.

Mr. GOSS. That is true, and amortization on an equitable basis of the cost of such improvement.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is correct.

Mr. GOSS. And that is the additional plant used in the production of fertilizer, and then not exceeding 6 per cent per annum on working capital used in connection with the manufacture of fertilizer.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly.

Mr. GOSS. Not on his invested capital; in other words, we are talking in one instance of buildings or equipment and in the other instance we are talking of cost of raw material.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But, as I have said, in all likelihood this money will be borrowed money.

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And the cost of that money is a proper charge.

Then we come to the next provision, which says:

And a reasonable actual carrying charge (exclusive of 8 per cent profit thereon).

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. When you talk about profit, are you going to have a profit on every turnover? Is the 8 per cent going to be added to that?

Mr. GOSS. No; that is why the language safeguarding that condition was written in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and the Chair being in doubt, on a division there were 73 ayes and 77 noes.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. SNELL and Mr. HILL of Alabama.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 95 ayes and 114 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto now close. I want to say to Members that if this motion prevails, it is my intention to move that the committee rise. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11051, for the utilization of the Muscle Shoals property, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ELECTION OF A MEMBER

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

MAY 4, 1932.

Hon. JOHN N. GARNER,
Speaker of the House, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: From the secretary of the Commonwealth of the State of Pennsylvania I have received the certificate of election, in due form, of Hon. HOWARD W. STULL as a Representative elect to the Seventy-second Congress from the twentieth congressional district of Pennsylvania to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Hon. J. Russell Leech.

Yours very truly,

SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. VINSON of Georgia, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for one week, on account of important business.

LEAVE TO FILE MINORITY VIEWS

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have until Friday evening to file minority views on H. R. 11552.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, can the Chair inform me when the Army bill will probably be introduced and printed copies of the bill be available for Members?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know. He has not seen the gentleman from Mississippi or the gentleman from Tennessee. The Chair understands that the pending bill will be continued to-morrow, and the Army bill will be taken up immediately on the conclusion of this bill.

Mr. SNELL. Does not the Speaker think that we should have the right to look the bill over before it is taken up and considered?

The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to enter into a discussion of that.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, we took up several appropriation bills for general debate at the last Congress just as soon as they were introduced before we had the printed bill.

Mr. SNELL. I understand the Army bill has been ready for two or three weeks.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the Republican administration in the last Congress several appropriation bills were introduced from the floor and we took them up immediately for general debate.

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to say to the gentleman that the full Committee on Appropriations will meet to-morrow morning for a consideration of the report of the subcommittee. The bill will be reported soon thereafter.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House may have five legislative days in which to extend their own remarks on the Muscle Shoals bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILL AND CONCURRENT RESOLUTION SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and concurrent resolution of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. R. 8083. An act providing for the appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy of all midshipmen who graduate from the Naval Academy in 1932, and for other purposes; and

H. Con. Res. 24. Concurrent resolution thanking the Governor of Virginia for the statues of George Washington and Robert E. Lee.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 1047. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to deliver to the custody of the Historical Society of Montana, for preservation and exhibition, the silver service which was in use on the gunboat, No. 9, Helena;

S. 2396. An act to amend section 11 of the act approved February 22, 1889 (25 Stat. 676), relating to the admission into the Union of the States of North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, and Washington; and

S. 3908. An act to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate navigation on the Great Lakes and their connecting and tributary waters," approved February 8, 1895.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 5, 1932, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

Tentative list of committee hearings scheduled for Thursday, May 5, 1932, as reported to the floor leader by clerks of the several committees:

RIVERS AND HARBORS

(10.30 a. m.)

Hearings on Florida project.

RULES

(10.30 a. m.)

Hearings on Steagall banking bill.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. WARREN: Committee on Accounts. House Resolution 207. A resolution to pay Helen Glynn, daughter of Theresa C. Glynn, six months' compensation, and an additional amount not to exceed $250 to defray funeral expenses of the said Theresa C. Glynn (Rept. No. 1205). Ordered to be printed.

Mr. LEAVITT: Committee on Indian Affairs. S. 2986. An act to amend the act of March 13, 1924 (43 Stat. L. 21), so as to permit the Flathead, Kootenai, and Upper Pend d'Oreille Tribes or Nations of Indians to file suit thereunder; without amendment (Rept. No. 1211). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. SMITH of Virginia: Committee on the District of Columbia. H. R. 7305. A bill to permit construction, maintenance, and use of certain pipe lines for petroleum and petroleum products; without amendment (Rept. No. 1206). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia: Committee on the District of Columbia. Senate Joint Resolution 50. A joint resolution to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to close upper Water Street between Twenty-second and Twenty-third Streets; without amendment (Rept. No. 1207). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. GLASS. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] in attendance upon the disarmament conference at Geneva.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

PETITION OF THE NATIONAL ECONOMY COMMITTEE

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I present the petition of the National Economy Committee, signed by Archibald B. Roosevelt, secretary, New York City, and request that it be printed in the RECORD, omitting the long list of names, and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, without the signatures, as follows:

A PETITION FOR A REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES TO THE PRESIDENT AND THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES

In the exercise of the right of the people, secured by the first amendment of the Constitution, "peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances," we, the undersigned, present this petition for the abatement of the vast legalized abuse whereby great and increasing amounts of the money of the people are being disbursed to veterans who suffered no disability in war service, thus creating a specially privileged and favored class and undermining the confidence of the people in their Government.

We petition for the elimination of all expenditures for veterans of the World War who did not in fact suffer disability in war service. We petition for a return to the sound policy in which the World War veterans' legislation was first conceived—just and liberal compensation to the dependents of those who lost their lives in war service and to the veterans who in fact suffered some disability in the war. We petition for the repeal of the later statutes which permit payments for veterans of the World War who without suffering any physical detriment to themselves did no more than perform their duty as citizens. We petition for the repeal of the provisions of the Spanish-American pension statutes which permit payments to veterans for disabilities not connected with service in that war. We petition for the reduction of the Federal expenditures by not less than $450,000,000 annually which these reforms would effect.

We make it plain that we are not now speaking of the so-called "bonus," to which we are opposed, but we are speaking of a drastic reduction of the growing annual expenditures in the Federal Budget for veterans of the World War and Spanish-American War.

We submit for your immediate and serious consideration these facts:

The deficit of the Federal Government for the first 10 months of the present fiscal year is $2,334,105,142, and will exceed $2,500,000,000 by June 30, 1932.

Notwithstanding this enormous deficit, the House of Representatives, virtually without debate, passed a bill on April 9, 1932, appropriating $928,387,795 for veterans to be expended in the year beginning July 1, 1932. In the words of the Secretary of the Treasury on April 27, 1932: "We are spending annually about a billion dollars, or about one-fourth of our total expenditures, for the benefit of our veterans."

The people are entitled to know and are beginning to learn how this immense sum for veterans is being disbursed. A few of the main items of the $928,000,000 appropriation are these:

"Military and naval compensation":
(a) Compensation for death during war service, which is being paid to the dependents of approximately 97,500 veterans "whose deaths occurred in, or resulted from, service in the World War," at the annual rate of	$36,284,558
(b) Compensation for disabilities "incurred in, resulting from, or aggravated by military service during the World War," which is being paid to approximately 318,000 veterans, at the annual rate of	204,641,848
(c) Retired pay of emergency officers "who incurred physical disabilities in line of duty during the World War," which is being paid to approximately 6,900 former officers, at the annual rate of	11,046,040
(d) Disability allowances "to veterans of the World War for disabilities resulting from other than military and naval service," which is being paid to approximately 327,000 veterans, at the annual rate of	104,277,554
A total of	$356,250,000
"Administration, medical, hospital, and domiciliary services": Under this classification is appropriated $60,199,270 for the "salaries and expenses" of 40,346 employees, including clerks, doctors, nurses, etc., engaged in the administration of the system. The remainder is mainly for hospital and medical expenses, making a total for this item of	115,528,795
"Military and naval insurance": This item represents the war-time "term insurance," the expense of which was not covered by the monthly payments of the soldiers during the war, as distinguished from the "Government life insurance," which is self-sustaining from premium receipts	117,000,000
"Adjusted-service certificate fund": This item is for funds "to meet the demands for loans upon the adjusted-service certificates," commonly known as the "bonus"	100,000,000

The total of the above and other items for veterans of the World War is approximately $690,000,000, to which may be added the amount of such deficiency appropriations as may be required before June 30, 1933. In addition there is appropriated by the House bill the sum of $225,850,000 for the regular pensions for the veterans of all earlier wars, of which amount $116,393,447 is for pensions of veterans of the Spanish-American War.

The proportion of the total amount expended for World War veterans which is being disbursed for those who suffered no disability in war service is year by year increasing. While the original World War legislation restricted relief to cases of death or disability actually suffered in the war that principle was soon departed from. This was accomplished in two ways:

First, through a series of "legal presumptions" whereby disabilities arising up to January 1, 1925, are "presumed" to have arisen out of war service; and in this way, for the purposes of veterans' relief, the war period has been extended for six years beyond its actual termination. Second, by the law of July 3, 1930, pensions under the name of "disability allowances" are paid to veterans for disabilities wholly unconnected with the war period, even as artificially extended by law.

It is estimated that of all hospital care and treatment for World War veterans over 50 per cent is already for veterans whose disabilities are not connected with war service. Furthermore, as of March 31, 1932, the Veterans' Administration had paid cash disability allowances for nonservice-connected disabilities to 367,666 veterans of the World War; and it is estimated that by June 30, 1933, 561,000 World War veterans will be receiving disability allowances for nonservice-connected disabilities, a prospective increase of 193,334, or 52 per cent, in 15 months.

Thus there has insidiously grown up by legislative enactment—so gradually as not to be realized by the people at large—a system of war benefits for men who suffered no physical injury in war service already running into the hundreds of millions of dollars; a burden which will rapidly increase from year to year unless the present laws are repealed.

As testified by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives on April 26, 1932, the total amount expended by the Federal Government for veterans of the World War is already "about $6,000,000,000," and if continued "at the present rate without changes in the law, the Government will have spent $21,500,000,000 in 1945," a sum equal to the cost of the war itself, in addition to which State benefits to veterans of the World War have already amounted to $519,791,000.

The above recitals comprise a few—but a few only—of the facts demonstrating that an immense and growing legalized abuse has been fastened upon the people, which has reached a point which is beyond toleration and demands immediate abatement.

Your petitioners represent that the failure of the responsible officials of the Government to meet this issue is a chief cause of the prevailing lack of confidence of the people in the present conduct of their Federal Government. On April 27, 1932, the President referred to the "dominant national necessity" of reducing the expenditure of government. The Secretary of the Treasury recently appealed for a "restoration of national confidence" as a prime condition of staying the depression under which the people suffer. He, too, spoke in general terms of the necessity of "drastic economies." And yet in the face of the admitted crisis no clear and determined word has come from the President or the Secretary of the Treasury or from the leaders of the Congress calling for any sufficient reduction in the one great item of the Federal Budget, where hundreds of millions of dollars can be saved without injustice and without impairing any essential function of the Government.

The recently proposed economy bill contained provisions modifying a few of the most shocking anomalies of the veterans' system, with a possible saving of about 5 per cent of the total veterans' appropriation. Even this feeble and relatively inconsequential effort was slashed to pieces by the House of Representatives on May 3, 1932, by a vote of 211 to 119. Almost simultaneously, on May 2, 1932, the House of Representatives, virtually without debate, passed a new bill to include the widows and children of deceased World War veterans who died "of a disability not acquired in the service." This legislation, if adopted, is estimated to increase still further the burden of veterans' relief by an average of $20,000,000 during the next five years, and more thereafter. By these actions the House of Representatives again demonstrated its willingness to trifle with the national credit. We submit that until our public servants are ready to face this issue the confidence of the people will neither be obtained nor deserved.

Let no one assert that these petitioners desire to deprive any man who has served his country in military service of his just due. We advocate not merely just but liberal treatment of the dependents of all who lost their lives in war service and for all who suffered disability in war service. What we oppose is the payment of the great sums which are being disbursed to or for those who suffered no physical detriment in the war—a system which saps the resources of the people and creates a specially favored class receiving a great subsidy from the people at large.

We submit that this steadily mounting burden of expenditures for those who suffered no disability in the war is not only an intolerable menace to the national credit but reaches to the stability of popular government itself. Accordingly, we urgently pray that the President and the Congress will address themselves forthwith to the restoration of the national confidence by securing without delay the elimination of the appropriations for those veterans whose disabilities were not in fact incurred in service.

Your petitioners make these representations with respect, but with the firm resolve that this vast legalized abuse must be abated and that this grievance of the people must be redressed.

MAY 4, 1932.

THE FINANCIAL SITUATION

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the summer of 1932 can not be other than one of great moment. It may be the most important summer in the history of recent years. It will either mark the turning point for better economic conditions or for very much worse. If worse, the winter of 1932–33 will test government abroad and at home in a way we have not known even in the Great War. Every hour of this summer ought to be utilized by those in power in the solution of the problems which must be solved before conditions can be better. If not solved, inevitably conditions are to be more serious than we have experienced. These are problems which have been with us since the war. We have fought against their effects with expediency measures, but conditions grow more serious and will, I fear, continue to grow more and more serious until these problems are wisely disposed of. Talleyrand was wont to say that everybody is wiser than anybody. Upon that theory I am offering some observations to-day upon things as I see them. I do not presume to do more than call attention to what seems to me obvious in the present condition of affairs. Obvious but not dealt with as seems necessary for the public good.

The complaint is again being made against hoarding in this country. We might just as well inveigh against the law of self-defense as against the law of hoarding under present conditions. People who have money will not purchase commodities except to the amount which is absolutely necessary for their use so long as commodity prices are falling. People will not seek investments or initiate enterprises in industry so long as there seems to be no promise of return in the way of profit. Hoarding is notice to the Government "we are not satisfied with present policies."

We are advised over and over again that the difficulty lies in our want of courage and want of confidence. It is necessary to have courage. It is well to have confidence. These are essential to the struggle in which we are engaged. But when a man is lying upon his bed with a broken limb and gangrene is setting in, he may have all the courage in the world and he may have confidence, but he also needs a surgeon. The people of the country are instinctively distrustful of programs which are being proposed for the return of economic prosperity because such programs do not seem to them full and complete. We must expect the same condition of affairs to continue that has continued for some time unless there is a change for the better in some of the fundamental questions which are now before us. Palliatives may have their place, but more than palliatives are needed.

We are constantly told that we have great national wealth, some $400,000,000,000 of national wealth. The fact that we have this vast national wealth, the fact that we are thus blessed, and still conditions obtaining as they are, is proof positive that the policies under which this national wealth is being administered are unsound. It is proof enough that there is serious trouble calling for adjustment. It may be that I am mistaken; I trust that events will prove that I am mistaken, but I do not believe we are going to restore a better condition of affairs in this country by simply increasing taxes and providing methods by which people may get larger and larger loans and by talk of national wealth. The only policies thus far obtaining, not only in this country but in every government in the world of which I have any knowledge, the only policies now being proposed are policies which relate to increase of taxes and to providing for larger loans to the public, two policies which, standing alone, will bankrupt any people on earth.

Let us consider, Mr. President, some of the questions which seem to me naturally to lead to a timidity on the part of business, to a want of effort upon the part of industry, and to the unwillingness of men of affairs to go forward at the present time. They are not questions which pertain to our country alone, although some of them particularly relate to our condition of affairs. Some of them must find solution with other governments. We are compelled to take into consideration questions which are of world moment, however, because we are either directly or indirectly affected by them. They all have their bearing on the supply of money, on business, and the purchasing power of the people. They are all a part of a program of rebuilding world conditions.

It is now pretty generally believed that the disarmament conference at Geneva will not accomplish anything of great moment in the way of reducing armaments. That view is pretty well accepted. At the present time 75 per cent of the budgets of all the nations of the world are made up of expenditures for war, either past or anticipated, and in some of the countries of the world 85 per cent of their budgets must be accounted for in that way. One of the most discouraging facts is the burden of government, yet it can not be greatly reduced if there is to be no disarmament. If the disarmament conference shall fail to reduce armaments, shall fail to lift any part of the burden which peoples are now carrying, the taxpayers in every country in the world must enter again upon the long road with this crushing burden to which there seems to be no end, carrying a burden which is constantly increasing. It will spread discouragement, it will create uneasiness in the whole business world.

I do not know of anything so calculated to discourage investment, so calculated to discourage those who have means, as the knowledge of the fact that the weight of armaments is not only not to be lifted but in all probability is to be increased. Some of the countries where at the present time from 70 to 80 per cent of their budgets are for armaments of one nature or another are without money, they are without credit; millions of their people are upon the streets; and yet the exaction or the extortion is to be continued for the purpose of establishing heavier and heavier armaments. This load presses down more heavily, more destructively upon some, but none can escape its demoralizing effect. In my opinion armaments are undermining the citizenship of the world. They are breaking the morale and extinguishing the hope of peoples everywhere—in all lands. If the Geneva conference shall adjourn and shall advise the world that the European state of mind or mentality is such that there is no hope of lifting that burden or decreasing it, its effect, in my judgment, will not only be felt immediately in those countries but its effect will be felt everywhere. It is to be hoped, therefore, that the discouraging word from Geneva will be turned into more encouraging messages, and that in the end something will be done to relieve the situation.

I do not know how long the people will be willing to carry the burden which they are now carrying, but no one can be unmindful of the fact that the masses everywhere, including our own country, are becoming restless and resentful. We do not accomplish things in this country through revolution in the sense that that word is ordinarily used, but there can be no doubt of the feeling of the people generally throughout, including our own country, that governments are not successfully meeting the problems which now confront them.

Another proof of the state of mind of Europe is evidenced by the failure of the Danubian conference which was held some time ago. Almost all the countries upon either side of the blue Danube are in the deepest economic distress. Some of those countries have all but ceased to have a circulating medium; they are practically upon a state of barter. An effort was made to bring them together in a tariff or a customs union, with the hope that a better condition of affairs might be brought about. That effort failed, and it failed for the reason that those who were interested in the conference were still imbued with the spirit which came out of the great World War. That fateful spirit of antagonism brooded over the conference and caused it to break up without any good results. A group of nations were desirous of having a small customs union, including a limited number of states, because it was thought that that would be advantageous to such a small group; another group of nations were desirous of having a larger customs union, because they believed that that would inure to the benefit of the entire continent. Upon that issue the conference broke down, and those nations are left to face the summer of 1932 in a condition distressing beyond the power of human language to portray.

This, too, Mr. President, has its disturbing and depressing effect upon the business world and upon those who must carry forward in the economic world. The failure of the conference was notice to the world that Europe is not yet prepared to put behind the things which make for discord, for economic chaos, and take up the things which make for concord and economic solidarity and health. Such notice can but have a depressing effect in every financial center in the world.

Mr. President, it has already been foreshadowed that the Lausanne conference can not hope to succeed. If that conference should fail and the reparations question should go unsettled, we have economic chaos in the heart of Europe. With reparations still tormenting Europe, uneasiness and confusion of purpose are bound to prevail in the industrial world.

I mention these matters, Mr. President, in passing to the subject which I desire more particularly to discuss. It must be apparent to all that unless those who hold in their hands the reins of power, those who represent their governments on the Continent of Europe, can grapple with these problems upon a wider, more tolerant, and more liberal basis than they have heretofore worked to a common solution, the conditions in Europe will be serious beyond anything yet recorded since the war. No scheme of finance, no balancing of budgets can prevail for any length of time against the process of dissolution which such conditions make inevitable.

Mr. President, what I desire particularly to call attention to is the maldistribution or the unequal distribution of gold and its effect upon the price of commodities. In discussing the matter at this time I do nothing more than present the facts. The facts make the case.

Mr. President, there are a little less than $11,000,000,000 of monetary gold in the world. That would be a rather small amount upon which to do the vast volume of business of the world even if it were equitably or properly distributed. But the United States and France at the present time are in possession of nearly 70 per cent of the entire monetary gold supply of the world. The United States and France have a population of about 170,000,000, and these 170,000,000 people are in possession of 70 per cent of the monetary gold supply of the world. The remainder of the population of the world is about one billion four or five hundred million, and we have for common distribution among those millions a little less or possibly a little over $3,000,000,000 of gold, leaving a per capita circulation of something like $2. In those countries are included such advanced nations as Germany, England, and others, which do a vast volume of complex commercial and banking business. That is an unhealthy and an impossible situation. It can not endure.

It is significant to me to note that the abnormal flow of gold into France and into the United States marks the beginning of the collapse of securities and the fall of commodity prices. From early in the year 1929 to June 30, 1931, France increased her gold holdings 76 per cent, the United States 23 per cent, and the rest of the world, excluding Russia, decreased their gold holdings 15 per cent. To attack a nation's gold holdings is regarded under the gold standard almost as dangerous as an invasion of her territory. The moment, therefore, it was observed that the rest of the world was losing its gold holdings, the prolific parent of economic chaos—fear—brought on frantic efforts to hold gold; debtors were called upon to pay, commodities and securities were thrown upon the market, and deflation began and continued and bids fair to go further. The fall of commodity prices in point of time coincided almost precisely with the increased flow of gold into France and the United States.

Mr. President, it seems clear to me, when all the facts are considered, that the fright which still obtains was engendered by this maladjustment of the gold supply. But the world was in a condition to be easily frightened. Still crippled from the fearful losses incurred by the war; laboring under the peace treaties, which started an economic war; tormented by reparations; and bled white for additional armaments, it was natural that uneasiness should develop into a deep-seated fear the moment gold supplies began to fall in the other parts of the world. The fall of prices in the economic world is like the glacier on the side of the mountain—once started it sweeps all before it. So in this case. The depression affects alike the rich and the poor and the nations which have large gold holdings as well as those which have not, for the reason that those with whom they must do business have had their purchasing power destroyed. And gold hidden away in the banks or hidden away in the treasuries of nations might just as well be buried in the earth so far as serving the cause of the people generally is concerned.

Sir George Schuster in his budget speech to the late legislative assembly in India said:

> Unless the status of gold is placed in its proper perspective in world finance, one of two results must happen: Either the whole present economic system will collapse, or all the currencies of the world will have to be detached from gold. * * * America is straining every effort to find a policy which will bring about a rise in the gold price of commodities, or, in other words, a fall in the value of gold. * * * If it succeeds, its present currency system may survive; if it fails, they also must discard the gold standard. * * * It is impossible to escape the conclusion that the world is faced with two alternatives, either to find some means of reducing the real value of gold as expressed in commodities, or abandon gold altogether as a basis for currency * * * for such steps international action is required.

It is clear to me that the fall in the price of commodities and the liquidation of securities began with this exorbitant supply of gold in France and the United States. But France and the United States benefited very little by it, by reason of the fact that in those nations with which they must deal, the purchasing power of the people has been reduced by reason of this maldistribution of the precious metal. How can trade revive, how can commerce regain its old vigor, how can the purchasing power of the people be restored so long as these abnormal and illogical conditions prevail? I ask the advocates of the gold standard to advise us how normal conditions are to be restored under such an abnormal system?

Now, Mr. President, let us look at another phase of the question. I do not know what the indebtedness of the world is; I have been unable to find anybody who does know; but I have a letter from a distinguished individual who deals with the subject in which he says:

A reliable estimate of the national debt of 49 countries as of 1930 is $136,000,000,000. I do not have figures for the local debt of these countries, but for 29 countries the local debt is estimated at about $32,000,000,000. This would make a grand total of public indebtedness of $168,000,000,000, to which some further sum will have to be added for the countries missing.

Turning to our own country, our national debt is $18,000,000,000; our State and municipal debt is $17,000,000,000; railroad bonds, $11,000,000,000; industrial bonds and mortgages, $10,000,000,000; public-utility bonds and mortgages, $7,000,000,000; real-estate mortgages, $25,000,000,000; farm mortgages, in excess of $9,000,000,000; miscellaneous, $7,000,000,000, or over $150,000,000,000 when measured by commodity prices as compared with commodity prices at the time these debts were contracted.

Nearly 90 per cent of these debts are gold debts. That is, they are payable in gold. Nearly 90 per cent of them were contracted prior to 1929. Therefore, according to commodity prices at the present time, this debt is very nearly double what it appears to be upon the face of the contract.

I do not see how it will be possible to pay the gold indebtedness of the world, especially so long as the gold is controlled practically by two nations. There are only three ways that I know by which a nation can pay its debts—either in gold, or in goods in kind, or in service. They have not the gold; the tariff policies of the nations prevent them from paying in kind; and there is no opportunity to render the service. And how are they to purchase the products of the United States and France, and what good is our gold if we can not sell our products of farm and factory? It seems to me that we are against what might be called an impossible situation unless there can be a larger supply of money or a radical change in Federal policies.

You will recall when it was thought that England would have to go off the gold standard, the direst calamities were prophesied. Some of their ablest men thought it meant a catastrophe. Nevertheless by reason of the fact that England could not secure the gold with which to meet her exchange, she was forced off the gold standard. To-day England is the only bright spot on the horizon. The great and powerful nation which had been committed to the gold standard since 1849 departed from the gold standard, and it is the only nation to-day that seems to be recovering; which, to my mind, is some proof of the fact that there must be relief from this gold mentality in some way. There must be relief—if not by design, then by accident.

I read a paragraph or two from an article appearing in the New York Times of a few days ago:

It will be just six months to-morrow (March 21) since Great Britain went off the gold standard.

In the half-year period between September 21, the day of the autumnal equinox of 1931, and the vernal equinox of 1932 the country's economic and financial recovery has been one of the most amazing transformations in her history. * * *

As it was the tragic announcement of the abandonment of gold which convinced the world at large that England was in difficulties, so now the most striking, if not the most significant, evidence in rebuttal is the repayment this month to America and France, five months before they are due, of huge amounts borrowed last August for the specific purpose of keeping the country on gold and preventing the flight from the pound. They failed to do either, for Great Britain was then beyond recovery by means of makeshift emergency remedies.

But the country has convalesced to such an extent since then, by removing causes of the trouble and applying permanent remedies, that on March 4 it paid to American banks $150,000,000 of the $200,000,000 due next August, and at the same time reduced its debt to France from $100,000,000 to $35,000,000. Another $100,000,000 owed in France is held by individuals, and payment before the date of expiration in August is not optional with the British Government. * * *

But the balancing of the budget is already accomplished independently of tariff revenue, and there is even a surplus for the coming year.

More remarkable is the expectation that the income-tax rate, which was increased last September to 25 cents on the dollar to meet the emergency, will be reduced to its previous level.

The distribution of gold or the supply of gold is not the only feature of the monetary situation to which I desire to call attention.

Brooks Adams, in his book on the Law of Civilization and Decay, has this to say:

It appears to be a natural law that when social development has reached a certain stage and capital has accumulated sufficiently the class which has had the capacity to absorb it shall try to enhance the value of their property by legislation. This is done most easily by reducing the quantity of the currency which is a legal tender for payment of debts. A currency obviously gains in power as it shrinks in volume.

Mr. President, nearly one-half of the human family do not use gold. They do not desire to use gold. They do not have banks. They do not use checks. Nearly one-half the human family has been using silver for 3,000 years.

Aside from the question of bimetallism, aside from the question of any action upon the part of the United States alone, leaving to one side those problems, let us examine another feature of this question. Notwithstanding the fact that the gold supply had been decreasing as compared with the increase of the volume of business in the world, an effort was made in 1925 to force the gold standard upon the silver-using countries of the world. This, under all the circumstances and in the light of subsequent events, was a fearful mistake; it was an instance in which sheer selfishness wrought its own ruin. It was not a movement upon the part of those people themselves. It was not because their system of money had been unsatisfactory. It arose in a different source, and for a different reason, apparently.

The first step was taken in India, where the gold-bullion standard was established through the influence of Great Britain. I desire to call attention to a statement which was made at that time by Mr. Benjamin Strong, the governor of the New York Federal Reserve Bank. He was asked at that time his opinion as to that movement, and what its effect would be upon India and the rest of the world. He advised against it. He stated that those countries had not yet learned to use gold; they did not have banks and did not use checks; they were committed to the use of silver. He stated that to undertake to force them to the gold standard would force the silver upon the markets of the world, and would have its effect upon the entire business of the world. In a brief paragraph he said:

While somewhat outside the scope of the questionnaire, we feel justified in pointing out, and indeed emphasizing, that the attempt to introduce a full gold standard into India in advance of previous development of the banking machinery necessary for its operation would menace the successful working of the standard in India. The internal advantages of the gold standard can not be permanently enjoyed in India until the Indian people possess a banking organization capable of discharging the international responsibilities implicit in the acceptance of that standard. This, we believe, would be the case even if the initial obstacles to its establishment could be overcome. We are also of opinion that the resulting situation might render the functioning of the gold standard in other countries extremely unsatisfactory, and consequently the functioning of the gold standard in India itself of doubtful value, if not of positive disadvantage, to the economic well-being of the Indian people.

Thus, Mr. President, we find this program beginning about 1925 and consummated in 1929 and 1930: The flow of gold from the nations of the world into the banks of two of the leading nations of the world, leaving a large portion of the world without money of that kind upon which to transact business. Secondly, we find, even in the very midst of that movement, an effort to deprive nearly one-half of the human family of the money to which it had been committed for centuries; and we find that in accordance with those two movements the prices of commodities began to fall, and have kept pace with the movements above referred to. It would be impossible to adequately portray the misery, the poverty superinduced by this cruel and selfish policy.

Mr. President, I assert that to-day nearly half the human family are nearing a basis of barter. They are without means of exchange. Their purchasing power has been destroyed. They can not deal with nations as they have dealt heretofore. I can not understand why it would be unsafe or unsound to restore conditions as they were prior to 1925.

It is not an attack upon the gold standard. It is supplementing it, as it were, and strengthening it. It is furnishing a large part of the human family the means by which they have transacted business through all of these years. It relieves the drain upon gold. It helps to restore the purchasing power of countless millions.

Here, Mr. President, I invite attention to the language used by a man who does business in almost every country in the world, one of the great leaders in modern industry, and who is particularly acquainted with the Orient, Sir Henri Deterding, of the Royal Dutch Petroleum Co. In a recent statement he said:

> Have the great bankers who depend on world-wide trading (not on local trading) ever considered if it is possible for the world's trade to revive as long as something like 600,000,000 people—about half the world's population—whose wealth is mainly in the shape of silver—are precluded from participating in the trade of the world by reason of the fact that the commodity in their possession has been artificially reduced in value to a point which practically prevents them from being buyers of anything?

This is a succinct indictment of an unwise policy which had brought millions to the point of desperation. In a later interview he says:

> Gold is not adequate as a measuring rod, for there is not enough of it, and even what there is is mostly held by France and the United States. What's the use of hoarding gold in the cellar when the world is bankrupt? If silver were stabilized, millions of additional world wealth would be created in the eastern countries.

I might add here the views of many others, not only students of the subject but men active in world affairs. I am pointing to no new experiment. I am suggesting nothing more than to retrace the steps which lead to the present conditions, in part at least. I am convinced that to pursue the course we have been pursuing will not relieve the people of their great misery. If what I suggest is not sound, then I ask, What is the remedy? This eternal drifting means disaster.

I recur to a reference which I made in the beginning: We have vast wealth; but Rome had as much wealth when she fell as she had when she was in the height of her power. It was not properly administered. There was a defect in the administration of the wealth of the country.

France had as much wealth when Robespierre was at the head of the Committee of Public Safety as when Louis XIV was the head of the French Empire.

China to-day has perhaps the greatest undeveloped natural wealth in the world, with the possible exception of Russia. I do not mean we are approaching a fall or revolution, but I mean to say national wealth means little unless wisely administered.

It does not signify very much that we have vast national wealth unless it is administered in such a way as to bring reasonable prosperity to the great mass of the people. I venture to ask the question of the Senate, How are we going to restore the purchasing power of the people of the United States, or the purchasing power of the Orient, or the purchasing power of the world generally, upon the monetary basis upon which we are now moving? Can we do it by loaning money?

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation had for its purpose extending credit. I am not offering criticism. But it does not reach the root of our troubles. We must go further and deal with these problems which give assurance and confidence and the means by which people may extricate themselves. What proposal is before us, or before the other governments of the world, which will reach out and have a tendency to restore the purchasing power of the masses?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, of course the questions the Senator asks are indeed pertinent, and I have been tremendously interested in what the Senator has been saying. But what suggestion would the Senator make as to what we should do in the premises?

Mr. BORAH. I will come to that in just a moment. One naturally hesitates to offer a solution as to matters wholly within the competency of other governments, as reparations, but I venture this opinion, that unless the armaments of the world are reduced, so that that burden will be lightened upon the people; unless reparations are settled, so that Europe can regain economic recovery; and unless silver is restored to the place which it occupied prior to 1925, so that nearly one-half of the human family may have means by which to transact business, and, to some extent, restore their purchasing power, there can not, in my judgment, be any ready return to prosperity. Certainly not unless some of these matters are adjusted. We must sell something, we must do business with Europe, and we must do business with the Orient. I do not see how we are to be prosperous and to enjoy those things with the balance of the world deprived of its purchasing power and utterly in distress. I know others hold another view, but I feel strongly we can not escape the effect of the conditions prevailing in other countries.

I suggest, therefore, that the summer of 1932 should be devoted to those questions which are fundamental to the recovery of the people, not only of this country but of all countries. The people can not forever carry the load that is on them. They can not carry their present burden.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator whether he is favorably or otherwise impressed with the idea of establishing and maintaining the purchasing power of the dollar by the expansion and contraction of credits and currencies?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not know what effect that would have in this country. I am not committed to it. But I am perfectly sure that we can not stabilize the dollar by issuing currency to such an extent as to take care of these situations to which I have referred. Nor, in my judgment, can we return the United States to prosperity without taking into consideration all those questions.

Mr. FLETCHER. We can not do very much, as I see it, with the Geneva conference, we can not do very much with reference to armaments, and I do not know what we can do with reference to reparations. So that the other question, about increasing the money with which to do business, bringing silver into additional use as money—and I quite agree with the Senator about that—is the only one with which, it seems, we can make much progress.

Mr. BORAH. I am not advocating the silver proposition further than I have said; that is, to restore silver to the position it occupied prior to 1925. I leave the other phase of the silver to future discussion.

Mr. FLETCHER. As money; yes.

Mr. BORAH. I myself do not want to express the belief that the expedient to which the Senator referred will bring any real relief. I should want to consider more than I have before I express an opinion.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has not referred to the particular question I want to propound to him, but he has referred to the lack of purchasing power of the masses of the people as being one of the reasons why we have not had and can not have prosperity. I want to ask the Senator whether, before we can permanently restore the purchasing power of the masses of the people, it will not be necessary to take into consideration the fact that such a large proportion of the wealth of the country is owned by a comparatively small number of people, and whether this unequal distribution will not in some way have to be remedied before the purchasing power of the masses can be restored?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think the concentration of wealth in this country presents a serious problem, but it is aside from what I have in mind to-day.

It may be said, as stated by the Senator from Florida, that we can not do very much with certain of these questions. I do not exactly agree with that. If the United States had a pronounced policy, for instance, with reference to the restoration of silver to the place which it occupied prior to 1925, I am perfectly sure that a conference would result, and that something could be accomplished along that line. We have no policy in regard to it. We are offered no leadership in regard to it.

I feel perfectly sure that if the United States would throw its influence behind a movement to give silver the same place it had for 3,000 years in the Orient, there is scarcely a nation in the world which would not follow in the lead of the United States. The proposal is not an attack upon the gold standard, it is not a plea for the restoration of bimetallism, it is an effort to give 800,000,000 people what they are asking for, what they have used, and what they want to use again. The change in the first place resulted through the inordinate selfishness of those who desire to increase the value of their wealth.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I am in full accord with the Senator, in perfect harmony and agreement with him, in that respect; but what I had reference to was the other questions which the Senator said had to go along with our national policy—that is, the question of armaments and disarmament, the question of reparations, and that sort of thing. I agree with the Senator fully with respect to what he has said in connection with increasing the use of silver as money.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. If I remember correctly, the Senate, by unanimous vote, last year, asked the President to call a conference of the nations of the world in order that we might discuss the silver question, but that was disregarded by the administration.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I hear the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] sotto voce say that France and England would not agree to it. I ask the Senator from Utah to present to the Senate the facts which show that they would not agree to it. I think I know what took place.

It is my view that the United States made no real, sincere effort to bring about an international conference on the subject. I believe I am correct in saying the administration has not desired such a conference. That is the great trouble with the situation, the timidity of governments to take hold of those questions which are sinking their people into utter distress and degradation. There is not a leading man in Europe, I venture to declare, who does not know that unless settled, reparations will bring more distress to Europe. There is not a leading man in Europe who does not know that unless there is disarmament their people will sink under the load. The present chaotic condition is brought about through the failure and refusal of governments to take hold of these questions and as they in time will be compelled to do. We can wait until events drive us into action, but it will be at terrific cost to the peoples of the world. It took drastic action to get us into our present awful state, and it will take heroic and drastic action to get us out.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I want to express approval of the efforts of the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] for calling this matter to the attention of the Senate, of the Congress, of the country, and, I hope, of the world.

In my judgment, the question of the control of money is the most important question that confronts the parliament of any nation at any time. In this country the Federal Reserve Board is the recognized agency which handles and shapes our fiscal policy. I have made the statement on former occasions that the Federal Reserve Board has its hands in the pockets of every man who lives upon the face of the earth. That board controls the policy of this Nation, and this Nation very largely controls the financial policy of the world.

The distinguished Senator from Idaho has suggested as possible remedies for this condition, first, a reduction of armaments, and his speech fell upon a Senate that was considering the advisability of the building of 150 more ships for the Navy, at a total cost of from one to two billion dollars.

If disarmament can be brought about, it will take time; it can not be done now; it can not be done this spring or this summer; perhaps next fall. It may take years, and if that is one remedy, what are the people to do pending the consummation of disarmament?

The distinguished Senator suggested that the second remedy is through the calling of an international conference on bimetallism. I favor such a conference. But that can not be called now; it can not be called this spring; perhaps not the coming summer or the coming fall. If that is an ultimate remedy, it is one for the future. What are the millions of people of this country to do pending the effectiveness of disarmament, and pending the effectiveness of the proposal for an international conference on the further use of silver as money?

Mr. President, I have used a good many hours in the Senate in an effort to call the attention of the Senate to this identical problem, the influence of money upon all the peoples of America and the world. I realize the difficulties of getting this matter before the Senate and the Congress and the country; and knowing that it would take a long time to bring about the things the Senator suggests, I have been trying to provide some temporary expedients to suggest to the Senate, to the Congress, and the country which might help the people pending the bringing about of these great world reforms the Senator has so eloquently and ably suggested.

One means we had to suggest was a program of internal improvements. That was discussed at some length here earlier in the session, and the Senate turned it down.

Another proposal was suggested in the House of Representatives, a proposal to put money into circulation through the payment of the balance due the veterans of the Nation, not so much to pay the ex-soldiers as to use that vehicle to haul money to every section of the United States.

Mr. President, I think all will agree that that would be a temporary expedient. All admit it would do the job; all admit that the ex-soldiers want the money; all admit that they need the money; and I think everyone admits that through such a payment something like $2,000,000,000 could be scattered broadcast throughout the United States among 4,000,000 ex-soldiers, which would immediately tend to help the local conditions in every section of the United States. But when the bill was proposed in the other body of the Congress, the Chief Executive of this Nation saw fit to veto the bill before the hearings even started before the Ways and Means Committee. Then after the bill was considered by the Ways and Means Committee, the distinguished leader of the majority in the House of Representatives proposed a second veto of that proposal.

This morning's Washington Post carries on page 3 a news story, an Associated Press dispatch, under the headline "Doom of bonus bill foreseen by RAINEY—Plan will never pass, he says, as advocates claim idea is gaining." Not desiring to take the time of the Senate to have it read, I ask unanimous consent that the Associated Press dispatch be placed in the RECORD at this point in connection with my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Thursday, May 5, 1932]

DOOM OF BONUS BILL FORESEEN BY RAINEY—PLAN WILL NEVER PASS, HE SAYS, AS ADVOCATES CLAIM IDEA IS GAINING

A confident prediction that cash redemption of the $2,000,000,000 soldiers' bonus will not become law was made yesterday by the House majority leader. Meanwhile, the Ways and Means Committee prepared to act on the controverted proposal that the payment be made with currency issued for that purpose.

Representative RAINEY, the Democratic chieftain, told newspapermen flatly that the bill "hasn't a chance" and that "the committee won't approve any fiat money plan."

Bonus advocates insisted, however, that 11 of the 25 committee members already were on their side and hoped to add enough support for a majority.

"Our plan to pay the certificates is the only plan that will place money among the masses and cause an increase in the velocity of money and credits," Representative PATMAN (Democrat), Texas, said.

"It is gaining public support every day and this Congress can not afford to adjourn without doing something to help the masses of the people."

"Look what happened to money all over the world yesterday after the House passed the Goldsborough bill," Rainey said. "That bill provides for the mildest kind of inflation and leaves it in the hands of the Federal Reserve Board.

"The committee is not going to report such a drastic inflationary scheme as this bonus plan, and even if its sponsors do get it out on the floor, it can not become law this session.

"If a petition to discharge the committee gets the necessary 145 signatures, May 23 would be the first day a vote could be had under the rules. Then, supposing the House passed the bill, what chance would it have in the Senate that late in the session?"

RAINEY said it might be a good thing to get the bill on the floor for action so that business could be assured no fiat money will be issued.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, one of the great editors of the Nation—I will make it broader than that—one of the great editors of the world, not only of to-day, but of all times, Arthur Brisbane, has paid his compliments to-day in his world-wide-read column to this veto of the bonus bill by the distinguished majority leader of the House of Representatives. I send to the desk three paragraphs from Mr. Brisbane's editorial of to-day and ask that the same be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Representative RAINEY, of Illinois, says the Government will not print money to pay the soldiers' bonus, and all organized finance, badly frightened just now, but still influential, says the same.

Probably the soldiers won't get their bonus, but you can not help thinking of these things.

The soldiers alone could have distributed that money immediately in every corner of the United States. There is no other way of accomplishing that, no other way to start buying all over the country.

The Government owes two billions to the soldiers, will have to pay it some day.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, on yesterday Mr. Brisbane had something to say upon this identical question. I send to the desk and ask to have read in my time two paragraphs from his article.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VANDENBERG in the chair). Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

If more money should be printed, how will you distribute it? To irrigate land you must have canals or pipes. Putting it in a lake does no good. Similarly, issuing two or three billions and putting it in banks does no good.

The money could be put directly into the hands of the people, spent for coats, hats, shoes, automobiles, bills at the grocers, if the soldiers got their bonus.

But high finance fears that soldiers, with no financial training, might spend money foolishly.

A big Georgia peach grower said to a colored man, chopping a little wood in the cold:

"Why don't you have a big pile of wood in your yard like that white man?"

"I wouldn't trust no woman with that amount of wood at one time," said the careful brother.

That is how high finance feels about the soldiers' bonus.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, Mr. Brisbane is not the only great editor who is interested in this matter and who takes a view similar to that expressed by others throughout the country. We have a distinguished editor here in the city of Washington. This distinguished editor and writer has a syndicated article in the press of the country that is widely read. I refer to the writings of Mr. Mark Sullivan. On last Sunday the newspapers of the country which enjoy the benefits of Mr. Sullivan's writings carried one of his syndicated articles. This article is under the title:

Price of farm crops in October will determine result of fall election—Republicans have better chance if there is more money in circulation at voting time.

I ask that that portion of the article indicated by me may be read in my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

PRICE OF FARM CROPS IN OCTOBER WILL DETERMINE RESULT OF FALL ELECTION—REPUBLICANS HAVE BETTER CHANCE IF THERE IS MORE MONEY IN CIRCULATION AT VOTING TIME

By Mark Sullivan

Everything—everything political, social, or individual—hangs on this depression, especially politics. Depending on whether it continues or is measurably improved, it will determine the election in November. Tell me what the price of wheat will be during the first or second week of October—which is the time public sentiment gets "set"—and I will venture a prediction as to which party will win the presidential election on November 8. That outcome will not necessarily be logical, but it is commonly the way elections are determined in a time such as this.

In national politics one result of the depression is a demand for cheaper money. From some quarters the demand is for what the orthodox denounce as "rag money"; that is, money not based at all or not based sufficiently on gold. From other quarters the demand is for more money, but for more money of a sound kind, for an increase in the quality of what we can call "credit money." The Federal reserve system is just now very intelligently trying to bring about an increase in credit money. This effort should have the intended result. The attempt is being made in a highly intelligent way, and after waiting for conditions which give promise of success. The course now being taken has worked before under similar conditions.

The demand for more money of some kind is very strong and wholly legitimate. More money is needed to make prices of goods higher; and only by an increase in prices of goods can debts be paid. Mortgages contracted by farmers in 1929 and before, on the basis of conditions then existing, literally can not be paid, after principal or interest, at a time when prices are what they are now. A mortgage contracted on the basis of wheat at a dollar or more a bushel, and a valuation of land in accordance with that, can not be paid with 60-cent wheat. The thing is mathematically impossible. There must be either widespread default and dispossession or else an increase in the price of wheat and other commodities. One way to achieve higher prices—the way that occurs to everybody at a time like this, and a way that is entirely sound if done by sound means—is to increase the quantity of money.

If the attempt to bring about more money in a sound way, by increase of credit money, should by any chance fail, then inevitably we shall have, in the party conventions and in Congress, growing demand for more money of an unsound sort—any sort. More money, cheaper money, is the only way to relieve the debtor, and the debtor is going to insist on relief.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, in harmony with the statements made by Mr. Brisbane and by Mr. Mark Sullivan, we have in the public press of recent date another statement from likewise a great American editor. This editor and writer happens to be a Member of this body. I refer to the distinguished senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER]. I send to the desk one of his articles and ask that the same be read. The title of the article is, "Stabilized Dollar Would Aid In Recovery, Says CAPPER."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

STABILIZED DOLLAR WOULD AID IN RECOVERY, SAYS CAPPER

By ARTHUR CAPPER, United States Senator from Kansas

Money fundamentally, as I see it, is a medium of exchange. As money it is not, or should not, be a commodity of itself.

The dollar should have a constant purchasing power in relation to all the commodities. This rubber dollar we now have—this dollar that goes up and down, down and up—is a dishonest thing.

The House has passed a bill to stabilize the dollar through directing the Federal Reserve Board, the Federal reserve banks, and the Secretary of the Treasury to keep the dollar in a constant ratio to the Department of Labor commodity index.

MAY REMEDY ILLS

That stabilization bill, sponsored originally by economists, next backed by the farm organizations, I regard as one of the most important pieces of legislation before Congress. It will be of very great help in remedying our economic ills.

It has been widely advertised that the Federal Reserve Board, through what is termed open-market operations, is going to expand the currency and expand credit, so as to decrease the purchasing power of the dollar and increase the commodity price level.

The commodity price level—or the purchasing price of the dollar—should be restored practically to the level of 1926. Then the Federal Reserve Board should use open-market operations and its power of changing the discount rate to keep the purchasing power constant.

MONEY SHOULD SERVE ALL

The monetary system should be the servant of agriculture, labor, industry, commerce, mining—it can only be that if the dollar has a fairly constant purchasing power.

The Federal reserve system should be the servant of agriculture, labor, industry, commerce, mining—the servant of all the people and not so much the servant of the money-lending class of people, especially the big bankers of New York.

I am not attacking the money lenders—they are necessary, useful, and all that. But they should serve business generally, not rule it and ruin it, as there is danger under the present system.

The Congress should lay down a definite monetary policy, and that policy should be to regulate currency and credit so that the purchasing power of the dollar shall remain stable.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the article written by the distinguished senior Senator from Kansas is an argument in favor of the passage of what is known as the Goldsborough stabilization bill. That bill is now pending before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency. It passed the House of Representatives by a majority of 5 to 1. Yet when it reached this body I am advised through the public press that the leadership on the other side of the aisle had vetoed the bill before any hearings whatever had been held. I am further advised that the leadership on this side of the aisle likewise vetoed the bill in advance of any hearings. I am not following that leadership on either side of the aisle if the leadership takes that attitude. I am going to do what I can to get the bill out of the Committee on Banking and Currency and before this body for a vote.

Mr. President, there has been very much said about the question of more money in circulation or less money in circulation. During the past two or three months the country has come to the conclusion, as I verily believe, that we should have more money in circulation. I know the big banks of New York concede that to be true. The Federal reserve system concedes it to be true that we must have more money in circulation. As a competing plan with the so-called veterans' plan and the so-called stabilization plan, the Federal Reserve Board is trying to have the country believe that the board is now placing more money in circulation.

However, Mr. President, not imputing any bad intent to the Federal Reserve Board, I make the positive statement that the plan they are now following, instead of placing more money in circulation, is actually decreasing the amount of money in circulation. Since the first of this year the Federal Reserve Board has withdrawn from circulation $248,000,000. Week before last the Federal Reserve Board bought $93,000,000 worth of bonds and paid money for them, and that same week the banks of the country sent back to the Federal reserve banks $91,000,000 in payment for their obligations; so that the net result of that week's operations was an expansion of circulation of but $2,000,000. Last week, however, the Federal Reserve Board bought $113,000,000 of bonds, and the banks getting this money immediately sent it back to the Federal reserve, and sent $27,000,000 more back to the Federal reserve banks. So, although the Federal reserve system last week bought $113,000,000 of bonds, the circulation was decreased $27,000,000 more than the $113,000,000. Therefore, the plan of the Federal reserve system of placing more money in circulation is resulting in decreasing the amount of money in circulation.

Mr. President, as I stated, the question of cheap money or dear money and the handling of money are subjects of much controversy throughout the country. Since the bonus bill was introduced in this Congress, volumes have been written about that bill, and I now exhibit to the Senate a recent publication entitled "Billions for Veterans." This publication is financed by some one; it is published by some one for the particular purpose of killing or defeating or retarding the passage of the bonus bill. I find in this publication, on pages 116 and 117, considerable reference to a bill which I have introduced in the Senate. I ask unanimous consent to insert in my remarks at this point the portion of the book, on page 116 and page 117, indicated by pencil marks. I will not ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Senator THOMAS is even more specific and glowing in his promises. In his speech in the Senate introducing his measure, he said it would "bring about the following concrete results:

"(a) Will advance prices of commodities.

"(b) Will decrease the value of all debts.

"(c) Will decrease the value of all interest.

"(d) Will decrease the value of all taxes.

"(e) Will decrease the value of all salaries.

"(f) Will help the debtor class."

Both PATMAN and THOMAS, of course, are advocating outright inflation of the currency. Both of them omit to say that inflation is an immediate tax on everybody; that inflation is the perilous financial quicksand which wise business leaders have been doing their best to steer the Nation away from. Let us go down the line of the Senator's own "concrete results" and examine them:

(a) Will advance prices of commodities. Right. The cost of living will immediately go up; you and I and the veterans will have to pay more for our bread and meat and shoes. True, the people who are selling us these things will get more money for their products. But their money, in turn, will be reduced in value and will not buy them as much as the same amount did before.

(b) Will decrease the value of all debts. Right. If the veteran owes money, he won't have to pay so much real value back. But if he has lent money, he will not receive the full sum back. Robbing Peter to pay Paul!

(c) Will decrease the value of all interest. Right. If the veteran has a nest egg stowed away in the bank or in insurance or in investments against old age, his nest egg will shrink, as will the income from it.

(d) Will decrease the value of all taxes. Right. The Government simply will have to increase taxes in order to get the equivalent amount of value with which to operate.

(e) Will decrease the value of all salaries. Right. This may be pleasant for employers, but it will mean a wage reduction for millions of workers.

(f) Will help the debtor class. Right. There is the nub of the whole thing.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I will ask at this point to have read at the desk a letter just received from Mr. Frank J. Taylor, commissioner of the department of public welfare of the city of New York. The letter is addressed to the Hon. WRIGHT PATMAN, a Member of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

CITY OF NEW YORK,
DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WELFARE,
New York, May 4, 1932.

Hon. WRIGHT PATMAN,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN PATMAN: Pursuant to article 14, sections 117–119, of the public welfare law of the State of New York, the city of New York is obliged to give relief to a person who has served in the military or naval services of the United States and has been honorably discharged from said service, when in need of public relief.

Veteran relief, under the foregoing sections of the law, will cost the city of New York for the year 1932 not less than $7,000,000. The burdens placed upon the city by the State, and neglect by the National Government to properly take care of its veterans, can be relieved by the passage of an adequate "soldiers' bonus." If the bonus were paid in full at this time, the veteran would be immediately put on an independent basis and stimulate the circulation of money throughout the entire country in a very short time, thereby relieving the distressed conditions very apparent at this time.

The necessary human necessities that would be purchased would immediately stimulate manufacturing and other mercantile business.

Soldiers' bonus is an essential relief measure, and should be favorably considered at the earliest moment.

Very truly yours,

FRANK J. TAYLOR, Commissioner.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I realize full well that this bill, the so-called bonus bill, being a revenue-raising measure, must originate in the House of Representatives, and it must originate in the Ways and Means Committee of that great body. The Senate is without jurisdiction to consider a bill of this kind until such time as the bill comes over from that body. The Senate is powerless, Mr. President, to take up, even though introduced in the body, a bill having in view any purpose similar to that contained in the so-called bonus measure. I want to suggest, however, that in the event the House of Representatives shall pass that bill, and the bill shall come to this body so far as I am able, the bill will have early hearings and prompt, and, I hope, favorable consideration at the hands of the Senate.

NAVAL BUILDING PROGRAM

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 51) to authorize the building up of the United States Navy to the strength permitted by the Washington and London naval treaties.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cutting	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Dale	Kean	Schall
Bailey	Davis	Kendrick	Sheppard
Bankhead	Dickinson	Keyes	Shipstead
Barbour	Dill	King	Shortridge

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Bellport and Patchogue (N. Y.) Chambers of Commerce favoring the immediate expansion of public works for the purpose of aiding business and relieving unemployment, which were referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

He also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a petition from the Farmers and Merchants Welfare Association, of Englewood, Kans., praying for the passage of Senate bill 1197, known as the Frazier farm relief bill, and other relief measures, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the American Legion, Department of the District of Columbia, favoring inclusion in the District of Columbia appropriation bill of an item appropriating $600,000 for emergency unemployment relief in the District of Columbia, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a petition from Mrs. Adelaide Biddle Stark, of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the passage of the bill (S. 463) for the relief of Adelaide Biddle Stark, which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from Herman W. Cramer, of La Crosse, Kans., outlining a plan for settlement of debts due from foreign governments to the United States, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a petition from Chief Clinton Rickard, of the Tuscarora Reservation, Sanborn, N. Y., praying for an investigation in the matter of his arrest by the Royal Mounted Police of Canada at Maniwaki, Quebec, on September 16, 1931, together with a resolution adopted by M. B. Butler Camp, No. 7, United Spanish War Veterans, of Niagara Falls, N. Y., indorsing Chief Rickard and favoring an investigation of his case, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the West Philadelphia (Pa.) Boosters Association, indorsing Representative GEORGE A. WELSH, of Pennsylvania, for appointment as Federal judge, eastern district of Pennsylvania, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate the petition of the Brooklyn (N. Y.) Women's Constitutional Hoover-Curtis Committee (Inc.), protesting against the verdict rendered in the case of Lieut. Thomas S. Massie, Mrs. Granville Fortescue, Albert O. Jones, and E. J. Lord in the Territory of Hawaii, and praying that said verdict be set aside, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a petition in the form of a resolution adopted by the Minnesota Conference of the Evangelical Church, representing a constituency of approximately 20,000, praying for the declaration and designation of "a day of prayer and fasting, calling upon the people of the United States of all faiths and creeds to repent, in humility, of their sins, both national and individual, and to call upon their God to deliver us from spiritual indifference and economic chaos," which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BLAINE presented a resolution adopted by the Farmers' Union of Pekin County, Wis., favoring the continuance of the marketing act and the Federal Farm Board, and also the passage of Senate bill 1197, known as the Frazier farm relief bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. KING presented a memorial, numerously signed, of sundry citizens of Salt Lake City, Utah, remonstrating against reductions in the compensation of postal and other Federal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ASHURST presented telegrams in the nature of petitions signed by John D. Keeley, president, and Edmond G. Warren, secretary-treasurer, of Local Union No. 246, of Keams Canyon, and by Walter P. Taylor, fifth vice president National Federation of Federal Employees, of Tucson, in the State of Arizona, praying for the elimination of the "pay cut and married persons sections" of the legislative appropriation bill for the next fiscal year, also for the substitution of optional 30-year retirement for the compulsory retirement provision in the bill, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Yuma County (Ariz.) Chamber of Commerce, favoring repeal of the so-called recapture clause of the interstate commerce law, to operate retroactively, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE presented numerous petitions and papers and telegrams in the nature of petitions from sundry organizations of the State of California, praying for the prompt ratification of the World Court protocols, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Philanthropy and Civics Club, of Los Angeles, Calif., favoring the passage of legislation making it a crime to advocate or promote the overthrow of government by force or violence, and also favoring the exclusion and expulsion of alien communists, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented letters in the nature of memorials from sundry citizens and organizations of the State of California, remonstrating against the proposed increase in first-class postage rates in the pending tax bill, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions and letters and papers in the nature of petitions from sundry citizens and organizations of the State of California, praying for the passage of legislation providing for the cash payment of World War adjusted-compensation certificates (bonus), which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented letters, in the nature of memorials, from sundry citizens and organizations of the State of California, remonstrating against the passage of legislation limiting the retirement privilege of disabled emergency officers of the World War to combat disabilities contracted before the armistice, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented communications from sundry citizens and organizations of the State of California, favoring the balancing of the Budget, retrenchment in governmental expenditures, the maintenance of the national defense, the imposition of a fair sales tax, amendment of the Volstead Act, and the taxing of light wines and beers, and protesting against the payment of the so-called soldiers' bonus at this time, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WALCOTT presented a resolution of William H. Gordon Post, No. 50, American Legion, of Ansonia, Conn.,

favoring the passage of Senate bill 2263, placing certain employees of the Bureau of the Census under the civil service, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

He also presented the petition of members of the East Haven (Conn.) Half Hour Reading Club, praying for the passage of legislation for the regulation of motion pictures and the outlawing of the so-called block-booking of films, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented petitions of Wemanesa Grange, No. 170, of Gaylordsville; Wallingford Grange, No. 33, of Wallingford; Morris Grange, No. 119, of Morris; and Little River Grange, No. 36, of Hampton, all of the Patrons of Husbandry, in the State of Connecticut, praying for the granting of Philippine independence, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions and papers in the nature of petitions of the Women's Clubs of Somers and New Preston, and the Ladies' Group of the Whitneyville Congregational Church, of Hamden, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the ratification of the World Court protocols, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented papers in the nature of petitions of the Alliance, of Hartford, and the congregation of the Noank Baptist Church, of Noank, in the State of Connecticut, praying for the successful consummation of the Geneva disarmament conference, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented communications, in the nature of memorials, from the following granges, Patrons of Husbandry: Morris, No. 119, of Morris; Little River, No. 36, of Hampton; East Hampton, No. 109; Housatonic, No. 79, of Stratford; Hope, No. 20, of Torrington; East Hartford, No. 37; Pohtatuck, No. 129, of Newtown; Eureka, No. 62, of New Hartford; Trumbull, No. 134; Taghhannuck, No. 100, of Ellsworth; Wemanesa, No. 170, of Gaylordsville; Metichewan Grange, of New Milford; Seymour, No. 91; Preston City, No. 110; New Canaan, No. 38; Harwinton, No. 45, of Torrington; Mansfield, No. 64, of Storrs; Ellington, No. 46; Farmington, No. 49; Old Lyme Grange; Middlefield, No. 63; Guilford, No. 81; Highland, No. 113, of Killingly; Middlebury, No. 139; Winchester, No. 74; Brooklyn, No. 43; Wethersfield, No. 114; Beacon, No. 118; Hebron, No. 111; Wolf Den Grange, No. 61, of Abington; Woodbridge, No. 108, of New Haven; Central Pomona, No. 1, of Wethersfield; Berlin, No. 24; Groton, No. 176; Mystic, No. 171; Norwich, No. 172; Granby, No. 193; Konomoc, No. 41, of Waterford; Bolton, No. 47; Connecticut State Grange, of Suffield; Salisbury Grange; North Haven, No. 35; Pomona, No. 6, of Waterford; Cannon, No. 152, of Cannondale; Goshen, No. 143; Meriden, No. 29; Ridgefield, No. 165; Washington, No. 11; Killingworth, No. 66; Enfield, No. 151; Cawasa, No. 34, of Collinsville; Wallingford, No. 33; Cheshire, No. 23; Lebanon, No. 21; Bristol, No. 116; Clinton, No. 77; Good Will, No. 127; Columbia, No. 131; Riverton, No. 169; Wolcott, No. 173; and Durham, No. 57; all in the State of Connecticut, remonstrating against the imposition of additional taxes upon the automobile industry, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

PROCEDURE IN PLANT QUARANTINES

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred a petition with reference to the subject of insect quarantine. This petition has been signed by the New Jersey Senators and by the entire New Jersey delegation in the House of Representatives.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A STATEMENT ON THE PRINCIPLES AND PROCEDURE IN PLANT QUARANTINES, PREPARED AND INDORSED BY THE AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL INTERESTS OF NEW JERSEY

INTRODUCTION

At a time when there is so much confusion of thought with regard to the usefulness and the necessity for plant quarantines, and in view of present-day needs for economy in governmental expenditures, it has seemed desirable to present a carefully prepared statement for the consideration of those who finance and direct plant quarantines for the Nation as a whole.

The purpose of the statement is to endeavor to clarify the national policy on quarantines and to present a constructive method of operation. An example of the need for such clarification lies in the hearings recently held in Washington under the auspices of the Plant Quarantine and Control Administration of the Department of Agriculture to consider the abatement of four of the existing quarantines after the expenditure of millions of dollars in their administration.

The citizens of New Jersey are affected directly and indirectly by the application of a number of Federal quarantines applied because of the presence of injurious insect and fungous pests. It is realized by these citizens, who contribute through taxation and through loss of business and expense necessitated by quarantine regulations, that Federal quarantines are better as a program of public policy than a series of State quarantines. However, the problem should be considered from the long-time viewpoint, and the statement following is designed to lay the groundwork for a new viewpoint on the whole subject of plant quarantines.

1. THE NATURE OF A QUARANTINE

Our position on the nature of a quarantine is very adequately expressed in a statement of quarantine principles prepared by the National Plant Board. This particular expression sets forth so well our ideas on this subject that it is quoted herewith and fully indorsed.

"A quarantine involves at best an infringement on normal and customary personal liberty and property rights. Human liberty has been so dearly bought and is so easily lost that any encroachment on it is a matter for grave consideration; hence a quarantine should be established with reluctance, it should interfere as little as possible with established human and property rights, and it should be removed at the earliest possible moment."

2. AMENDMENT OF THE PLANT QUARANTINE ACT OF AUGUST 20, 1912 (37 STAT. 315), AS AMENDED

It is our firm conviction that some quarantines have been laid in the past, and are therefore likely to be laid in the future, which involve more injury to the country's business than any benefit derived from them. It is evident that such action should never be taken. It is therefore proposed that the fundamental quarantine act of 1912 be amended in such a way as to require the United States Secretary for Agriculture to cause a determination to be made of the prospective benefits of the proposed quarantine and the prospective damages accruing by reason of its action and to place the said proposed quarantine only in case the prospective benefits to the country far outweigh the prospective damages.

3. RESTRICTION ON INTERSTATE MOVEMENT A FEDERAL FUNCTION

In all instances where restrictions on the movement of plants and plant products are to be placed and enforced for the purpose of preventing or delaying spread of injurious insects and plant diseases, new to and not heretofore distributed in the United States, it is our firm conviction that such restriction should be placed, enforced, and financed by the Federal Government, because any attempt to restrict interstate commerce of this sort by State action is bound to be chaotic and the benefits derived from such restrictions by the Federal Government are enjoyed by that section of the United States outside the infested zone.

4. SUPPRESSION AS A MEANS OF PREVENTING SPREAD A FEDERAL FUNCTION

In addition to the cost of Federal quarantine enforcement, when suppression measures are to be undertaken within the limit of any State for the purpose of preventing or delaying spread into outside areas, the cost of such measures should be borne by the Federal Government.

5. SUPPRESSION AS A MEANS OF PROTECTING INFESTED TERRITORY A STATE FUNCTION

Suppression of injurious insects or plant diseases, whether new or not heretofore widely distributed in the United States, or old and widely distributed within the United States, in so far as this said suppression applies to the protection of the States or infested territory, should be carried on and financed by the State itself.

6. FEDERAL QUARANTINE AND SUPPRESSION EFFORTS WITHIN A STATE SHOULD INVOLVE COOPERATIVE UNDERSTANDING

All quarantine enforcement and all suppression undertaken by the Federal Government within the limits of a State should be carried out on the basis of a cooperative understanding between the Federal Government and the State government.

7. POSITION WITH REGARD TO PRESENT PLANT QUARANTINES

So far as quarantines now in effect are concerned on account of insect or fungous pests, we favor the gradual abandonment of these quarantines, except where it has been demonstrated that spread can be definitely controlled by regulatory measures. Such abandonment or comprehensive revision of regulations pertaining to quarantines now in effect should be carried out only upon the basis of a studied policy, in the formation of which all interests affected have been consulted.

8. POSITION WITH REGARD TO THE EXTERMINATION OF NEW PESTS

When the Japanese beetle was first found in 1916 it covered an area of not more than one square mile. It is entirely probable that if adequate funds had been available this insect might have been wiped out and large succeeding expenditures avoided. This is only one instance, of which there have been a number in the past and doubtless will be a number in the future, where prompt action with adequate funds might have effected tremendous future savings. It is therefore our firm conviction that measures should be taken and moneys appropriated making it possible to exterminate the injurious insect or plant disease if when first found such procedure seems practical.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR TREASURY DEPARTMENT

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I ask that there be printed in the RECORD a letter that has been written me, at my request, by the Treasurer of the United States; also a statement he has made in regard to the effect of the proposed 10 per cent cut on the operation of the United States Treasury.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 4, 1932.

DEAR SENATOR ODDIE: In response to your request regarding the effect it would have on the operations of the Treasurer's Office if a 10 per cent reduction were made in the amount to be appropriated for the coming year the following is submitted:

The Treasurer's Office receives and pays all Federal funds. It involves the acceptance, scrutiny, and count of $10,000,000 per day in currency, the honoring of 100,000 checks per day, and 1,000,000 interest coupons per month. In addition to that the honoring of all the Federal interest-bearing securities as they are presented for redemption. Each document must be scrutinized for genuineness and the accounts relating thereto must be kept with strict accuracy.

As you are, no doubt, aware, the duties of this office have increased to such an extent that an increase rather than a decrease in the amount of appropriation needed to conduct the office during 1933 was demonstrated to the Director of the Budget and to the House Appropriation Committee to be unavoidable.

In support of the sum needed to conduct the office, please note that the soldier bonus, relief to veterans, aid to agriculture, etc., increased the number of checks honored during 1931 over the number during 1930 by 3,300,000, and that during the present year the increase over 1930 will be 4,000,000. During 1933 the increase will be about 6,000,000.

It is also pertinent to point out that this office is required to attend to the acceptance of the Postal Savings collateral. The aggregate of such collateral on deposit July 1, 1930, was $204,000,000. Since that time the Postal Savings have increased to such a huge extent that the collateral now on deposit exceeds $711,000,000—an increase of 250 per cent in 20 months.

The security deposited to secure Postal Savings consists of a great variety of bonds—Federal, State, and municipal—and it requires the most particular scrutiny to determine its acceptability. It is a highly technical task to determine that the rules are complied with.

The increase in the check clearings and the postal-savings tasks caused the compliance with the Saturday half holiday law to be a most difficult requirement for the currency operations, and the check operations are quantity operations. A clerk can examine just so many checks and count just so many notes per day. There is almost an exact mathematical proportion between the number of employees engaged on the work and the number of bills and checks to be handled. As no additional provision was made to meet the Saturday half holiday, the work required to be accomplished in 5½ days instead of 6 was accomplished only by exacting extreme diligence and by overtime being required. It requires overtime of many employees just after each pay day and every Saturday afternoon.

When it is realized that the Government's currency operations and the check clearance operations relate to each of the Government's activities, and must be performed with strict accuracy and on time (for checks must be cleared within due-course rules), it must be appreciated that an adequate clerical force must be provided to meet the tasks.

It is only after the clearance of the checks and the proof of the accuracy of the money and the redemption operations that the Government's financial position is known. The Treasury must know daily and with strict accuracy just what the Government's financial position is before the daily statement is released.

The effect of a 10 per cent reduction in the funds to pay the force would so seriously handicap production that it would be reflected in the character of the results. It would force the discharge of 74 employees. Such a reduction can not be made without so seriously crippling the operating force that the accuracy of the financial accounts with the banks, the redemption and the clearance operations, and the reports based on the records pertaining thereto would all be jeopardized.

A memorandum prepared by the Treasurer, addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, which more fully covers the foregoing, is attached hereto.

Respectfully,

W. O. WOODS, Treasurer.

Hon. T. L. ODDIE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 3, 1932.

Memorandum for the Secretary.

It seems proper to invite your attention to the effect the proposed 10 per cent reduction in appropriations would have on the Treasurer's Office.

Due to the increase in the volume of work in this office the department, the Budget, and the House of Representatives granted a $21,200 increase in the appropriation for the fiscal year 1933 over the amount appropriated for the current fiscal year. The necessity for additional funds to carry on the work of the office was recognized as imperative, notwithstanding the desire to avoid increase, and hence it is self-evident that the curtailment of the amount now proposed would prevent functioning on a current basis. In this statement, the necessity for the increased appropriation carried in the pending bill is reiterated, and the effect of a 10 per cent reduction is shown.

The estimate "Salaries, Office of the Treasurer of the United States" provides for the salaries of all employees of the Treasurer's Office except those engaged in redeeming national bank and Federal reserve currency. The increase in the estimate is based principally on two factors; viz, the additional number of checks to be handled and the increase in the acceptance of postal savings collateral.

During the fiscal year 1931, due to legislation passed by Congress relative to loans to veterans, disability allowances to veterans, drought relief, and loans to farmers, there was an increase of 3,300,000 checks or approximately 11 per cent. No provision was made in the appropriation for this work, but detailed employees were secured, the value of whose services was $26,854. A part of this additional work carried over into the current fiscal year and at the same time the number of checks issued for disability allowances began to be a real factor. As the claims were adjudicated and settled, the issue of a monthly check in each case commenced. It is estimated that 3,600,000 such checks will be issued this fiscal year. This does not mean a net increase of that aggregate in the total number of checks because the number of bonus checks and drought-relief checks which were nonrecurring was 2,250,000, so that the increase in the total is estimated at 750,000. There is an estimated increase in the disability allowance checks of 2,000,000 during the fiscal year 1933. Thus the increase of 750,000 this year over last year will cause this year's aggregate to surpass the previous year by 4,000,000, and next year's aggregate, with a still further increase of 2,000,000, will be an aggregate of 6,000,000 over 1930.

The handling of checks is in the main a physical task. They must be examined, proved, sorted, and listed. Itemized statements of each account must be sent each month to the disbursing officer concerned. A clerk can examine, sort, and list just so many checks per day. There is almost an exact mathematical relationship between the number of clerks and the number of checks received and cleared. In the clearing operation it is only by the most diligent of effort that the volume of checks we receive can be handled on time. There is no waste of time, and it very frequently occurs that the check-clearing force is kept on duty beyond regulation hours. That is particularly true on the days following pay days and on Saturdays. The great amount of overtime demonstrates diligence during regular hours.

The other principal increase in work has been in the handling of collateral placed with the Treasurer to secure the deposits of postal savings funds. On June 30, 1930, the total amount of collateral on deposit was $204,000,000; on June 30, 1931, the total was $357,000,000, an increase of $153,000,000. This will be more appreciated when it is realized that the greatest increase in any previous fiscal year was $18,000,000. To-day the collateral on deposit amounts to $711,000,000, an increase of $354,000,000 in 10 months of this fiscal year. This collateral must be examined critically and recorded with extreme care. In the case of municipal bonds, their acceptability must be most particularly ascertained. The task is performed with great exactness. The market must be closely observed so that the proper valuation is certain to be accorded the collateral. Coupons must be detached at each interest period and transmitted to the owner of the collateral. A great amount of correspondence is required in the performance of this task. There is no immediate prospect of any decrease in this work but on the contrary the collateral on deposit is mounting. The necessity for extreme care is obvious.

The work in other branches of the office has increased, but to a lesser degree. For instance, in the cash room the work has been increased by recent changes in two offices from cash payment of salaries to check payment. Those changes will result in an annual increase of 175,000 in checks presented over the counter for payment either to individuals or to local banks.

There has been an addition in the number of accounts carried in the division of general accounts. In neither of those branches has the clerical force been increased.

During the current fiscal year a deficiency appropriation of $20,000 was shown to be imperatively necessary, and that sum was obtained, and, in addition, details of employees were secured. A number of these details have expired and others will expire June 30. Congress recognized the necessity for additional funds this year, and surely with an increase in work it certainly seems unreasonable to require a reduction equal to about $100,000 below the amount expended this year. It seems appropriate to remark that when the Saturday half holiday law became effective this office was forced to absorb it, for no additional funds were provided to meet it. It was met by exacting that the work of six days be crowded into five and one-half days. Greater diligence and overtime met the requirement.

The following table shows the amount expended for the fiscal years 1931, 1932, and the estimate for 1933, together with the number of checks handled and the increase of Postal Savings collateral on deposit:

Treasurer's appropriation	$1,215,026	$1,227,800	$1,269,000
Detailed force	26,854	13,490	----------
Deficiency appropriation	----------	20,000	----------
Total	1,241,880	1,261,290	1,269,000
Number of checks	34,700,000	35,450,000	37,450,000
Postal savings collateral increase	$153,000,000	$375,000,000	(?)

A reduction of 10 per cent in the estimate would mean that the force would have to be reduced 60 employees plus the savings resulted from several anticipated retirements. That would be imperative to bring the rolls down to the proposed figure. The divisions which handled the work described above would bear the brunt of this decrease because 70 per cent of the force of this office is employed in those divisions.

The work of clearing checks must be accomplished in due course in order to guard against loss. At present, for about 10 days per month, practically the entire force of the accounting division is engaged in the clearance operation, and on those days overtime is the rule rather than the exception. The less current work, such as sorting of checks and preparation of itemized check statements for disbursing officers, is temporarily laid aside. With a reduced force it would be next to impossible to complete the clearance on some days within due course rules, and thus recourse against the indorsers on an improperly paid check would be jeopardized. The monthly statements of the checking accounts of the officers who draw the checks are now only kept current during the last three months of the fiscal year. During the summer-vacation period the work falls behind and is not brought up to date until about April. With a reduction in force that class of our work would simply slip further and further behind. Manifestly, it is very poor administration to permit the business of such a character to fall in arrears.

Prompt handling of checks is essential in the case of forgeries, raised checks, etc., if hope of apprehending the wrongdoer is to be expected, and books must be posted promptly to prevent the honoring of overdrafts in the accounts of disbursing officers. In short, if check-clearing operations are not conducted efficiently, the procedure of Government payments is very seriously handicapped.

It is absolutely essential in the handling of securities and cash to have sufficient force properly and adequately to perform the task. When an office handles millions of dollars in negotiable securities and cash every day, the necessity for a sufficient number of employees to properly examine and account for them does not seem open to argument. It is obvious that inadequate check and inadequate safeguards could lose enough in one day to equal the 10 per cent cut.

This office receives and accounts for all moneys coming into the possession of the Treasury. All disbursements of Government funds are charged to the account of the Treasurer. Unless the Treasurer functions efficiently, the entire Government financial operations are impaired.

The other appropriation under control of the Treasurer, "Salaries, Office of the Treasurer of the United States, national currency reimbursable," provides for the force engaged in the redemption of national-bank and Federal-reserve currency. The entire cost of this work is borne by the banks so that any reduction in this estimate would simply result in a decrease in the receipts for the following fiscal year. A reduction in the appropriation would be no benefit to the Government. On the contrary, an insufficient appropriation for this work would result in a direct loss. The banks maintain a fund of 5 per cent of their outstanding circulation to redeem their notes. The notes received for redemption are charged against this account. If a sufficient force is not maintained and redemptions are permitted to accumulate, the accumulation would soon exceed the 5 per cent fund and the Government would have to advance funds to meet the redemption of the excess. To do this it would be forced to borrow money and the interest on that money would be a direct charge against the Government for which no reimbursement would be received. There is now a billion dollars more in Federal reserve notes outstanding than on the corresponding day one year ago. This forecasts much larger redemptions in the fiscal year 1933 than in this fiscal year. In view of this there is a possibility that the estimate for 1933 will be insufficient. A reduction in the appropriation would mean no saving to the Government. As shown above, it might mean a loss. A 10 per cent reduction would mean the dismissal of 14 employees on this roll.

The foregoing is set forth with a view to causing it to be made clear that a 10 per cent cut in the funds would have an effect that would be such an unwise thing to do that it does not seem that the Congress would require it if those who have the responsibility of ordering it were fully alive to the effect of such a requirement.

Respectfully,

W. O. WOODS, Treasurer.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 4576) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to grant an easement for railroad right of way over and upon a portion of the helium-gas-bearing lands of the United States of America, in Potter County, in the State of Texas, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 638) thereon.

Mr. TRAMMELL, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 361) for the relief of Mary E. Stebbins, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 639) thereon.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 2960) for the relief of the estate of Anton W. Fischer, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 640) thereon.

Mr. GLENN, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 368) for the relief of Joliet National Bank, Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, and H. William, John J., Edward F., and Ellen C. Sharpe, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 645) thereon.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 4513) for the relief of Walter Thomas Foreman, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 647) thereon.

Mr. HOWELL, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2633) for the relief of William R. Cox, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 648) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 256. An act authorizing adjustment of the claim of Madrigal & Co., Manila, Philippine Islands (Rept. No. 649);

S. 261. An act authorizing adjustment of the claims of John T. Lennon and George T. Flora (Rept. No. 650);

S. 4258. An act authorizing adjustment of the claim of the Franklin Surety Co. (Rept. No. 651);

S. 4440. An act authorizing adjustment of the claim of George H. Hansen (Rept. No. 652);

S. 4441. An act authorizing adjustment of the claim of the National Surety Co. (Rept. No. 653);

S. 4567. An act to provide for the settlement of claims against the United States on account of property damage, personal injury, or death (Rept. No. 658);

H. R. 4144. An act for the relief of H. H. Lee (Rept. No. 656).

Mr. REED, from the Committee on Immigration, to which was referred the bill (S. 4425) relating to the immigration and naturalization of certain natives of the Virgin Islands, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 641) thereon.

Mr. FRAZIER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 4352. An act to amend an act (ch. 300) entitled "An act authorizing the Coos (Kowes) Bay, Lower Umpqua (Kalawatset), and Siuslaw Tribes of Indians of the State of Oregon to present their claims to the Court of Claims," approved February 23, 1929 (45 Stat. 1256) (Rept. No. 642); and

H. R. 10161. An act amending the act of May 25, 1918, with reference to employing farmers in the Indian Service, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 643).

Mr. FRAZIER also (for Mr. WHEELER), from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5940) for the relief of Florian Ford, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 644) thereon.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4349) authorizing the President of the United States to present a Navy cross to Carlos V. Cusachs, late lieutenant commander, United States Navy, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 646) thereon.

Mr. TYDINGS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4270) for the relief of Commander Francis James Cleary, United States Navy, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 657) thereon.

NATIONAL EMPLOYMENT SYSTEM

Mr. DALE submitted the views of the minority of the Committee on Commerce to accompany the bill (S. 2687) to provide for the establishment of a national employment system and for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such system, and for other purposes, heretofore reported from that committee with an amendment, which were ordered to be printed as part 2 of Report No. 589.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED

Mr. WATERMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills:

On May 4, 1932:

S. 460. An act to give war-time commissioned rank to retired warrant officers and enlisted men;

S. 2428. An act to provide for the confirmation of a selection of certain lands by the State of Arizona for the benefit of the University of Arizona;

S. 2967. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Randolph, Mo.; and

S. 3953. An act to amend the act approved February 7, 1927, entitled "An act to promote the mining of potash on the public domain."

On May 5, 1932:

S. 1047. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to deliver to the custody of the Historical Society of Montana, for preservation and exhibition, the silver service which was in use on the gunboat, No. 9, Helena;

S. 2396. An act to amend section 11 of the act approved February 22, 1889 (25 Stat. 676), relating to the admission into the Union of the States of North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, and Washington; and

S. 3908. An act to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate navigation on the Great Lakes and their connecting and tributary waters," approved February 8, 1895.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF THE POST OFFICE COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

Mr. ODDIE, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably sundry nominations of postmasters, which were placed on the Executive Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HALE:

A bill (S. 4580) granting an increase of pension to Annie Luesson (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. VANDENBERG:

A bill (S. 4581) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the St. Clair River at or near Port Huron, Mich.; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A bill (S. 4582) for the relief of the State of Tennessee (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 4583) authorizing an appropriation of $13,500 for purchase from the Tennessee Great Smoky Mountains Park Commission, Knoxville, Tenn., of a topographic map covering part of the Great Smoky Mountains National Park (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma:

A bill (S. 4584) for the relief of George Spybuck and Rosa Spybuck Perry; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. DICKINSON (for Mr. BROOKHART):

A bill (S. 4585) granting an annuity to Samuel R. Stone; to the Committee on Finance.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. HOWELL, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4039) for the relief of Herman H. Bradford, and it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CLERK IN THE DISBURSING OFFICE

Mr. FLETCHER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 208), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to employ a clerk for service in the disbursing office of the Senate, at the rate of $2,220 per annum, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided by law.

THE PRESIDENT'S RECONSTRUCTION PROGRAM—ADDRESS BY SENATOR BYRNES

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the RECORD a speech delivered by the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] last night over the Dixie network of the Columbia Broadcasting System.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Spokesmen for the President declare that with the enactment of the revenue bill the reconstruction program of the President will be complete, and the assistant Republican leader of the Senate, Mr. MCNARY, proposes the adjournment of Congress on June 12. The President's program has consisted of (1) his recommendation for legislation granting a moratorium to our European debtors, (2) the enactment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, (3) the approval of the Glass-Steagall bill, and (4) the passage of the pending revenue bill.

Consideration of this program shows that it was a reconstruction program that failed to reconstruct. By the granting of the moratorium the payment this year of approximately $250,000,000 was waived, and the deficit in our Treasury was increased by that amount of money. Most of us now agree that this legislation did not contribute to the recovery of business in America. Certainly I am of the opinion that there should be no further extension of time for the payment of these debts. If our European debtors can raise funds with which to maintain large standing armies and construct battleships, they can raise funds with which to pay what they owe the American people.

The next measure of the program was the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act. Willingly I concede that by reason of the loans made by this corporation some bank failures have been averted and many depositors benefited. But when we speak of the few bank failures now occurring we must remember that since Mr. Hoover became President three years ago 4,861 banks have closed their doors, and necessarily there are not so very many banks left in operation. Even as I concede that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has been of benefit, I urge that as soon as the emergency has passed this corporation should be liquidated. Government has no money except that wrung from the people in taxes. The taxpayers can not hope to pay enough taxes to run a bank financing all the banks and railroads of America. Furthermore the existence of this corporation is now used as an excuse for every unsound proposal demanded of Congress. There are now too many people who believe that government in some way should support every citizen. That is not my conception of government. It is the duty of every citizen to support the Government, but it is not the duty of the Government to support every citizen. And it is not the duty of government to finance every bank and every railroad.

When the Reconstruction Finance Corporation failed to accomplish all that had been anticipated in restoring the confidence of the bankers and inducing them to furnish credit to legitimate business in America, the Glass-Steagall law was enacted. This measure provides that additional collateral held by the local banks can be used by them to borrow from the Federal reserve banks.

It was hoped that it would cause the bankers to feel sufficiently reassured to again make loans to customers. It failed in its purpose. Business men to-day find it difficult to borrow even upon Liberty bonds.

Since the passage of the Glass-Steagall bill in February, instead of the local banks borrowing more money, as was expected, from the Federal reserve banks, they have borrowed $100,000,000 less. The quarterly report as of April 27 shows the total amount borrowed by member banks to be only $531,824,000 when they could borrow $8,000,000,000.

I do not mean to indulge in denunciation of the bankers of America. I think I understand their mental attitude. To-day, before they make a loan they want to know in what business the borrower expects to invest the proceeds of the loan, and unless they can see some hope of profit in the proposed business there will be no loan. Recent experiences have made them not only cautious but overcautious.

The only other measure upon the reconstruction program of this administration is the very general recommendation that the Budget be balanced. Of course, we must balance the Budget, but in balancing it too much attention is being given to additional taxation, too little to the reduction of expenditures. And, as to its effect upon business, we must remember this depression was not brought about by any failure to balance the Budget. When in the fall of 1929 the price of securities and the price of commodities "hit the toboggan" for the long, long trail they have since pursued, there was a surplus in the Treasury of the United States. At the end of the fiscal year, June 30, there was a surplus in the Treasury of approximately $190,000,000. The deficit which makes necessary the balancing of the Budget did not develop until the summer of 1931, so we may as well recognize that the depression was not caused by a deficit in the Treasury but that the deficit in the Treasury was caused by the depression in business.

If the only hope of the administration for the restoration of normal business is based upon the passage of a revenue bill taking from the people in taxes an additional billion dollars, then there is justification for the despair and demoralization that exist in the business world. With incomes depleted, with dividends reduced or discontinued, with losses supplanting profits, with salaries reduced, with cotton selling at 5 cents per pound and wheat netting the farmer 35 to 40 cents per bushel, from every corner of the Nation there has come the demand for a reduction of taxes by the Government. State, county, and city governments have responded with reduced levies. The Federal Government proposes to respond by levying more than $1,000,000,000 additional taxes. Only the thoughtless man can hope that this additional revenue can be secured solely from the rich. To-day the tax collector looks in vain for the rich. Those whom we yesterday regarded as in the millionaire class know not to-day whether they are solvent. We can not levy an additional billion dollars of taxes without hurting all the people, seriously burdening the already overburdened business man, increasing his losses, making it necessary for him to dismiss employees, and adding to the army of the unemployed.

Even this hurried reference to the administration's program discloses its utter failure. Now, it is hardly necessary for me to refer to existing conditions. However, we can not blind ourselves to the fact that as the administration announces the completion of its program the prices of commodities and securities are lower than at any time since the beginning of this panic in the fall of 1929. The people of America owe, including the obligations of governments, corporations, and individuals, approximately $100,000,000,000. These debts were contracted at a time when a bale of cotton was worth $100 instead of $25; when a bushel of wheat was worth $1.50 instead of 40 cents. The people can not pay their debts with commodities at present prices. All the people can not go into the bankruptcy courts.

To-day whenever a debtor considers that in order to pay his debts contracted three years ago he must give three times as much of his labor or of his products as he would have given three years ago he loses all incentive to labor. In an effort to relieve this situation the Democratic House has passed the Goldsborough bill, directing the Federal Reserve Board to use all of its power to bring about the inflation of credit and currency so as to increase the price of commodities. I hope the Senate will pass this measure. It may be said that the board now has this power. It has not exercised it. The board announces that it has been attempting to bring about mild inflation. If so, it has been so mild it can not be detected. It is true that without any additional legislation the President, who appoints the Federal Reserve Board, can influence them to increase their purchases of Government securities, further reduce the rate of discount, and use the influence of the board to reestablish the confidence of the bankers.

But the President has failed to act. The Secretary of the Treasury, at the luncheon of the Associated Press in New York on April 25, said:

"What would appear to be required now is the stimulus of credit expansion supported by a liberal policy of the Federal reserve system."

Only now does that appear necessary to the Secretary of the Treasury, from whom the President gets his advice on all financial matters. It appeared necessary to almost everyone else in America two years ago. Had the necessity appeared to the Secretary and the President at that time, many a business and many a home would have been saved. Because, even now, it only appears necessary to Mr. Mills, Congress should pass the Goldsborough bill, declare the policy, and demand its enforcement. The times and conditions demand resolute and positive action instead of mild and hesitant action. The President should profit by his experience. He did not advocate the establishment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation until during his administration 4,861 banks had closed their doors. We should not hesitate to bring about this controlled inflation of credit and currency through the Federal Reserve Board until a similar disaster shall overtake the farms and factories of America.

PAYMENT TO INDIAN PUEBLOS

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 2914, Order of Business 223, a measure introduced by my colleague [Mr. CUTTING] and myself jointly, be referred back to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be recommitted.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has again called attention to the economic situation confronting not only our own country but the world, and to the very evident timidity of governments in attempting to solve the problems presented. However, I call his attention to the fact that there is actually some evidence of boldness in Congress in this connection; for, although a Democratic House of Representatives, as in the case of the Republican Senate, has passed no constructive measure during this Congress to the end of affording economic equality to the farmer, yet the House did, in my opinion, made real economic history last Monday, May 2, by adopting one of the most important measures for all industries, including agriculture, ever presented to the American Congress. It has for its purpose the restoration of the commodity price level to a normal level, as defined in the bill, through the stabilization of the purchasing power of the dollar.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Does the distinguished Senator understand that that bill has been vetoed by the leadership in this body on both sides of the aisle, if the public press reports are to be believed, even in advance of hearings being held on the measure?

Mr. HOWELL. I am not convinced by the reports in the public press in reference to a matter of such tremendous importance and possessing such great possibilities for the welfare of the Nation.

This bill has for its purpose, as I say, the restoration of the commodity price level to a normal level, as defined in the bill, through the stabilization of the purchasing power of the dollar.

I can conceive of nothing more vital to the welfare of every economic group and hence of every individual in this country, including the farmer, than to provide for the stability of the unit of value and thereby eliminate the violent fluctuations in values that have afflicted us so greatly in the past.

Never before has Congress assumed the responsibility placed upon it by the Constitution of the United States to provide for a stable unit of money. Section 8 of our Constitution empowers Congress "to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures." Yet for nearly 150 years Congress has allowed the value of money to fluctuate from one extreme to another.

In 1920 the purchasing power of the dollar was 64.8 cents. By the following year, as the result of a deflation policy, the purchasing power of the dollar had risen to $1.025, and by 1931 it had further risen to $1.406, or 40.6 cents more than was its purchasing power in 1920. This is the purchasing power of the dollar as expressed in terms of wholesale prices of commodities, as indicated by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, United States Department of Labor.

When the dollar gains in purchasing power it means that the prices of commodities have fallen, because commodity prices are expressed in terms of dollars. I desire to insert in the RECORD at this point a table showing the violent fluctuations in the purchasing power of the dollar from 1890 to 1931.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. HOWELL. A money standard that fluctuates in value from 64 cents to $1.40 within a little more than a decade is an unjust standard. It means a dishonest dollar. The man who borrowed money in 1920, when the dollar was worth 64 cents, would have to pay back more than twice as much when it is worth $1.40. The total indebtedness, both public and private, in the United States is $203,000,000,000, as estimated by Doctors Warren and Pearson, of Cornell University—Farm Economics, Cornell University. I wish to insert in the RECORD this estimate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Debt:	Amount
Corporations	$76,000,000,000
Urban mortgages [1]	37,000,000,000
Bank loans	35,000,000,000
State, county, and local	21,000,000,000
National	18,000,000,000
Farm mortgages	9,000,000,000
Life insurance policy loans and premium notes	3,000,000,000
Retail installment paper [2]	3,000,000,000
Pawnbrokers' loans and unlawful loans of all kinds [3]	1,000,000,000
Total	203,000,000,000

Mr. HOWELL. Much of this debt was contracted when the dollar had a very low purchasing power. Our war debt was contracted in a period of high prices, when the dollar had a very low purchasing power, ranging from 64.8 cents to 85.1 cents. We now have to repay this debt with a dollar worth $1.406, or 117 per cent more than in 1920.

[2] Based on reports of the National Association of Finance Companies.

[3] Ryan, F. W., Family Finance in the United States, the Journal of Business of the University of Chicago, Vol. III, No. 4, pt. 1, p. 404, October, 1930.

In 1920 the total public debt of the Federal Government was $24,000,000,000; in 1931 it was $16,000,000,000. In terms of dollars this represented a reduction in our public debt of $8,000,000,000. However, the present public debt of $16,000,000,000, despite all we have paid off, is in reality equivalent to nearly $35,000,000,000 on the basis of the present purchasing power of the dollar, or an increase of 117 per cent in our debt burden. Thus, despite the fact that we have retired our public debt by nearly $1,000,000,000 a year, we now have a greater debt burden than we had in 1920, due entirely to the fluctuation of the purchasing power of the dollar.

This Government can survive such catastrophic changes as this, but tens of thousands of our business enterprises and millions of our citizens can not. They have been and will continue to be ruined by these violent changes in values. Agriculture has been hit harder than most industries by this injustice, because its prices have declined more than the average. The farm-price index has dropped to 60, and the farmers' dollar of debt and taxes has, therefore, become approximately $1.70. A dollar which represented one-half bushel of wheat in 1919 represented a bushel in 1929, and in the early summer of 1931 represented three bushels. Is there anything honest about such a standard of value as that?

Mr. President, it is nothing short of a national disgrace that we allow such violent fluctuations in the purchasing power of the dollar. We have deflated our currency until the dollar is worth twice what it was in 1920 and in the neighborhood of 45 per cent more than it was in the pre-war period; and what has been the result? We have thrown thousands into bankruptcy, wiped out the savings of a lifetime of toil of hundreds of thousands of our citizens, tremendously increased the public and private debt burden, dried up the income of our citizens, closed factories, thrown millions out of work, precipitated the greatest peace-time deficit in the history of this Government, and brought misery, discontent, and privation upon the country generally. All of which is appalling, almost incomprehensible, when it is realized that much of it could have been prevented by a wise and aggressive monetary policy.

Though I am not approving policies adopted in Europe for the purpose of stabilization, yet it is a fact that France, instead of allowing her currency to be deflated, revalued her franc at a level of one-fifth of its pre-war value, which was the prevailing value of the franc in 1928 at the time this stabilization operation was undertaken. France accomplished this by reducing the weight of gold in the franc to one-fifth the pre-war amount, reducing it from 322.58 milligrams of gold 900/1000 fine to 65.5 milligrams of gold 900/1000 fine. As a result, France is prosperous and her people are happy. Debts can be repaid on a level comparable with that on which they were contracted.

England tried deflation in 1925, and shook the foundations of the country, with the result that she was forced to abandon the gold standard in September, 1931. Since then the value of the pound sterling has dropped about 38 per cent, and commodity prices have increased in about the same proportion. Business has improved, employment has increased, and there is renewed confidence among the people.

The bill that passed the House last Monday does not mean in any sense the abandonment of the gold standard. It has the indorsement of the leading economist of this country—men like Prof. Irving Fisher, of Yale University; Prof. Willford I. King, of New York University; Prof. G. F. Warren, of Cornell University; and numerous others. It is supported by the American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Grange, the National Farmers' Union, and other farm organizations. Its principle is also indorsed by the American Federation of Labor. Some experts believe that to accomplish the desired result the bill should also include a provision permitting the Federal Reserve Board to change the price paid for gold from time to time. Experience may indicate that this might become a desirable anchor to windward in case of storm, yet it is not necessary to the experiment proposed. The important feature of this measure is that it proposes to establish a principle to the end of making substantial progress in the right direction.

The Senate has thus far taken no action along this line, although of such vital importance to the welfare of every citizen in this country. Yet a bill introduced by the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], almost identical in character, has been pending before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency for some time. However, no action has been taken thereon, although this session is rapidly nearing a close. The responsibility is ours, placed upon us by the Constitution of the United States—the responsibility of providing a stable unit of value. We must not adjourn until we have fulfilled this responsibility. If there ever was a time in the history of this country when a restoration of commodity values and a stabilization of values is needed, it is now.

Restore the commodity price level, and you restore prosperity to this country and all that prosperity connotes—busy factories, work for the unemployed, living-wage scales for workers, markets for farm produce, ability to pay debts. When this is done we will not need to worry about balancing the Federal Budget. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation can shut up shop, and the loans already made can be repaid. Deposits will return to the banks, and public confidence will be restored.

Practically every reputable economist who has studied this question agrees that stabilization of the value of money is not only necessary but feasible. I have had compiled a series of brief statements of eminent economists, financiers, industrial and agricultural leaders, and financial experts, showing the widespread agreement among leaders that something must be done to stabilize values. I offer this for the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska?

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT EMINENT ECONOMISTS, BANKERS, FINANCIAL EXPERTS, BUSINESS AND AGRICULTURAL LEADERS SAY ABOUT MONEY STABILIZATION

ECONOMISTS

As far back as 1824, John Rooke, in a book entitled "Inquiry Into the Principles of National Wealth," published in Edinburgh, stated:

"The regulation of the new system is that in whatever proportion the general and annual price of farm labor throughout the kingdom has a tendency to rise or fall, that rise or fall shall be counteracted by a reverse rise or fall in the current price of the gold and silver coin."

The distinguished Swedish economist, Gustav Cassel, in his book Money and Foreign Exchange (1922 edition, p. 254), stated:

"The only quality demanded of a monetary system which is of any importance for promoting the trade and general welfare of the world is stability."

Dr. Irving Fisher, professor of economics at Yale University, who has been a student of this subject for many years and has written numerous books on the subject, testified before the House subcommittee in behalf of the proposed legislation. The following extract is quoted from his testimony:

"I can put in nine propositions my main beliefs on this subject:

"First. That money has always hitherto been unstable, with very few exceptions, one being when the Federal reserve system, under the leadership of Governor Strong, was trying to stabilize it between 1921 and 1929.

"Second. That both inflation and deflation are injurious, and, if extreme, as at present, are ruinous.

"Third. That the evils from inflation and deflation may be summarized under three heads: Social injustice, social discontent, and social inefficiency. These evils bring poverty, bankruptcy, unemployment, suicide, bloodshed, political unheavals—they are behind all the legislation, practically, that is exciting any comment now in Congress—war, and revolution.

"Fourth. That the realization of these evils is hidden. There is no realization of these evils by most people, because they are hidden by what I call the money illusion. We think in terms of money, and take it for granted that it is stable.

"Fifth. That the present depression is for the most part due—I would say nine-tenths due—to deflation.

"Sixth. That the price level, if we do not do anything about it, could still go down far below where it is now. There would be no absolute bottom to the abyss into which we could plunge—I do not say will plunge, but could plunge—until we got down 95 per cent lower than we are now, which would ruin practically every business man and every farmer in the country.

"Seventh. What has happened—as well as this further fall that is still possible—was all or mostly preventable.

"Eighth. That even to-day it is partially curable.

"Ninth. If it is not cured, our whole American individualistic and capitalistic system is in danger.

"I heard one of the leading bankers—I wish I had permission to quote him, but I do not want to do anything I am not authorized to do—the president of one of the largest banks in one of our largest cities, and the chairman of one of the most important committees of the American Bankers' Association, say that we must raise the price level to let people pay their debts, and that if we do not he fears that the whole capitalistic system is going to collapse. He was willing to raise the price level by changing the weight of the dollar."

John Maynard Keynes, who is one of the leading economists of Great Britain, stated in an article in the New Republic, February 27, 1924:

"Currency reform has two objects: To remedy the credit cycle and to mitigate unemployment and all the evils of uncertainty, and to link the monetary standard to what matters, namely, the value of staple articles of consumption, instead of to an object of oriental splendor, it is true, and one to which Egyptian and Chaldean bank directors attributed magical properties, but not otherwise useful in itself and precarious in its future prospects."

Dr. E. W. Kemmerer, professor of economics at Princeton University, one of the eminent economists of this country, who has been consulted by a large number of foreign countries in regard to their financial problems and monetary problems, stated at a meeting of the Stable Money Association, December, 1927:

"* * * The world sooner or later must either learn how to stabilize the gold standard or devise some other monetary standard to take its place.

"There is probably no defect in the world's economic organization to-day more serious than the fact that we use as our unit of value not a thing with a fixed value but a fixed weight of gold with a widely varying value. In a little less than a half century here in the United States we have seen our yardstick of value, namely, the value of a gold dollar, exhibit the following gyrations: From 1879 to 1896 it rose 27 per cent; from 1896 to 1920 it fell 70 per cent; from 1920 to September, 1927, it rose 56 per cent. If, figuratively speaking, we say that the yardstick of value was 36 inches long in 1879, when the United States returned to the gold standard, then it was 46 inches long in 1896, 13.5 inches long in 1920, and is 21 inches long to-day."

Dr. John R. Commons, professor of economics at the University of Wisconsin, in an article in the North American Review, January and February, 1928, says:

"Congress has given to them as a system authority for concerted action which enables them, as has been explained, to control the value of gold and the general level of world prices, but Congress has laid down no policy except the vague 'accommodation of business and commerce,' thus putting on the Federal reserve authorities the unfair responsibility of using their uninstructed and private judgment as to what is needed by, and desirable for, the country from time to time. This omission has already caused a division within the system, as to whether the rate of rediscount should be uniformly lowered in order to help Europe buy American farm exports, or kept at a higher rate to aid the bankers in making profits. Had Congress retained the first draft of the Federal reserve bill, which would have instructed the system to maintain stability of the general price level, the wholesome effect of a definitely known policy might have been enjoyed. Even the extreme fluctuation of 1919 and 1920 might have been avoided by stopping inflation sooner and making the deflation less severe, just as afterwards a price inflation was stopped in 1923 and a price deflation was controlled in 1925. * * *."

Sir Josiah Stamp, internationally known economist of England, a director of the Bank of England, and head of one of the largest railways in England, wrote an introduction to one of Doctor Fisher's books, The Money Illusion (English edition), in which he said in part:

"Money as a physical medium of exchange made a diversified civilization possible. * * * And yet it is money, in its mechanical even more than its spiritual effects, which may well, having brought us to the present level, actually destroy society. * * *

"Everything depends upon whether our combined and international wisdom can master the next stage of monetary science. Certainly the old ideas and practices will no longer serve.

"I have long said that a new development in monetary knowledge is the most important single problem of our age—more important than unemployment, industrial peace, or capitalism, because fundamental to them all. * * *

"The number of thinking men who appreciate, ad hoc, the fact of monetary fluctuation is now not small; but the proportion who carry that appreciation into the other fields of thought as a persistent element in the mall is singularly few. It means the same kind of effort of mind as the realization of terrestrial or astronomical motion. Even when realized it is deemed a little pedantic to insist upon it.

"The revolutionary proposal embodied in the Dawes plan to make the annual reparation burden fluctuate with the value of gold passes with little or no comment, whereas 'interference' with the monetary burden by altering the aggregate, the period of years, or the rate of interest for reparations or international loans excites political feeling at once. * * *

"Whether our monetary standard is to be of pure and visible gold or an unseen one managed by a golden handle, or whether gold is to have no more effect upon the price level than the mercury in the thermometer has upon the temperature, the next decade will more clearly show."

Dr. G. F. Warren, professor of economics, Cornell University, and an eminent authority on this subject, stated in an address on The Economic Situation, delivered at a meeting in Syracuse, N. Y., March 15, 1932:

"There are only two possible solutions of the present business chaos. Either the commodity price level must rise to and remain at the level at which public and private debts were contracted, or else the endless bankruptcies, of which we have had a sample, must continue. Public and private debts in 1929 were estimated to be 56 per cent of the national wealth. The wealth is primarily based on commodity prices. If the wealth should shrink one-third, the debts would become 84 per cent of the wealth, and a large part of them could never be paid. A beginning of this liquidation has occurred in the last two years. It promises to be temporarily interrupted, but unless commodity prices can be raised and kept somewhere near the level at which the debts were incurred, the liquidation will have to continue. The debts can not be paid with a dollar that is worth 50 per cent more than the dollar which was borrowed. It is popularly assumed that the creditor profits by getting a more valuable dollar, but if the dollar rises in value too much, the creditor gets nothing. He may get possession of an unsalable price of property with a tax bill thrown in for good measure.

* * * * * * *

"Since debts are largely based on commodities, either directly or on copper in an electric line, rails in a railroad, and lumber and steel in a building, the only way to restore prosperity quickly is to have commodity prices rise. Complete liquidation would ultimately restore prosperity, but it would take many years, with endless economic and political trouble."

Major Bellerby, an English professor of economics, stated in a letter to Doctor Fisher, of Yale University, February, 1931:

"I think you may take it that this country has fairly definitely in mind two ends: The first is to secure the expansion of industry through the expansion of currency and credit and through the recovery of prices; the second is to institute a system of stabilization of the price level when prices have reached a position at which they yield an adequate margin of profit and when unemployment has fallen well below a million. These two aims were accepted by the McMillan committee as ideal. It is fairly safe to say that they are now the accepted objectives of the Government."

Prof. T. E. Gregory, London School of Economics:

"The efforts of the politicians [to end the depression] must be seconded by the central banks—a concerted effort must be made, primarily through the financing of budgetary deficits through central bank credit, to cause a rise in prices."

Dr. Williford I. King, professor of economics at New York University, testifying in behalf of the proposed legislation before the House subcommittee, said in part:

"Now, if the price level keeps on falling, we shall undoubtedly see not only more bank failures but we shall also see life-insurance companies going to the wall, one by one. It can hardly be otherwise, because they have entered into contracts to pay certain amounts of dollars, and if this price level keeps on falling, they will be unable to fulfill these contracts; and, one by one, they will fall. In fact, all concerns that have agreed to pay a fixed number of dollars will eventually be driven out of business, forced to the wall, if the price levels should continue to go on down.

* * * * * * *

"Now, it seems to me that we should recognize that our price-control system in the United States is very antiquated. We are still operating on very much the same type of currency that they had in ancient Rome; that is, we depend upon gold and silver, gold primarily, and the value of our money is dependent entirely upon the chance fluctuations of the value of gold. If we discover a lot more gold mines in some other part of the world, then the value of our money falls, and prices rise. If we do not, the other thing happens. That is, we have no regulation for our currency, no regulation for the value of our money. Congress was given the power to regulate all the weights and measures, and they have regulated such things as the length of the yard. We have a very accurate measure of that kind, so we can always tell how much a yard is.

* * * * * * *

"It would not be as bad to have a variable yard as it is to have variable money, because we measure everything that we buy and sell in money, and that affects all of our transactions; so that variable money is worse than a variable yard.

"My opinion would be, therefore, that long since the time has come when we should have regulated the value of our money, fixed it at a definite price in terms of commodities; that is, we should have a commodity standard of value, rather than this chance standard of one commodity.

"Therefore I would say that I would be heartily in favor of the principles of the bill here which Congressman GOLDSBOROUGH has introduced, and I hope that you will proceed to adopt it, or something along the same line, in the near future; and I believe that you are serving the United States better by that than by any other single measure. This will not do everything everybody wants to do, but this will probably do more good to the business and economic life of the country than any other single measure that is before Congress."

BANKERS AND BUSINESS MEN

The necessity for stabilization of values is recognized not only by economists but also by bankers, financiers, and great industrial leaders. A number of these were recently associated in an organization known as the Stable Money Association, which included such men as Charles G. Dawes, Nicholas Murray Butler, Elihu Root, Frank O. Lowden, William Green, Paul Warburg, Sir Josiah Stamp, John W. Davis, and Silas H. Strawn. All of these were honorary vice presidents at one time or another. Among others associated with this movement were: Silas H. Strawn, Owen D. Young, Alfred P. Sloan, jr., Otto H. Kahn, Pierre S. du Pont, George Eastman, John J. Raskob, and Bernard M. Baruch.

Reginald McKenna, formerly Chancellor of the British Exchequer and now head of the Joint City & Midland Bank, perhaps the largest bank in the world, stated at its annual meeting in January, 1922:

"The truth is, of course, that both [inflation and deflation] are bad. What is needed is stability, the point from which both alike proceed in opposite directions. When we have stability of prices we have a basis upon which trade can be carried on with confidence."

Again he said in his journal, The Midland Bank (Ltd.) Monthly Review, in an article, The Problem of Gold Values Regulating Demand or Supply, 1927:

"History has shown that apart, perhaps, from wars and religious intolerance no single factor has been more productive of misery and misfortune than the high degree of variability in the general price level. This may sound like an extravagant statement, but so far from being of the nature of a demagogic outburst it is clearly demonstrable from the course of events in various countries ever since money became an important element in the life of civilized communities. A stable price level is a thing to be desired, second only to international and domestic peace."

Lord D'Abernon, a banker and peer of England and minister of Great Britain to Germany for several years, stated in his book, German Currency: Its Collapse and Recovery, 1920–1926:

"There is a kind of ironical justice in the fact that the classes in Germany who in the end suffered the most heavy losses from inflation were those who were the most favorable to it in the early stages. They imagined that loans contracted on a given date and repayable six months later in paper would be repaid by them on very advantageous terms, providing large note issues continued to be made. They not unnaturally held that a currency dispensation which facilitated such a pleasant business could not be wholly vile or radically unsound. As long as currency depreciation remains within moderate limits their calculation was sound, but the final result was that, when the ultimate crash came, all the profits which had been acquired through this astute calculation vanished in the catastrophe, and the excessive issues which they had favored led to the confiscation of so large a portion of their holdings that their temporary gains were more than swept away."

Paul Warburg, eminent banker and financier, formerly a member of the Federal Reserve Board, stated on May 24, 1927:

"The association shares the view universally held that the interest of the country is served best by the greatest possible stability of price levels, and believes that in fashioning their discount and open-market investment policy, the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks should ever be mindful of this aim.

"* * * It would be dangerous, however, to permit the fallacious impression to assert itself in the minds of the people that the Federal reserve system (no matter how much its officers might bend their efforts in the direction of obtaining price stability) could be held responsible for failure in attaining this ideal which, as already stated, could only be reached by the cooperation under a common plan of forces entirely outside of the Federal reserve system's control, not only in the United States, but all the world over."

Gov. Benjamin Strong, formerly governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, said in an article in Collier's Weekly in 1923:

"Therefore, is not the fundamental condition of industrial and national tranquillity that of a reasonable stability of prices, as from 1909 until toward the close of 1915?

"I believe with Mr. Henry Ford that what the great body of our workingmen most desire is security of employment and an adequate wage that represents a fairly even and stable purchasing power."

Adolph C. Miller, member of the Federal Reserve Board, stated at a joint conference of the chairman and governors of the Federal reserve banks in Washington, October 26, 1921:

"We should seek just as earnestly to avoid deflation as we should to avoid inflation. By inflation I mean an expansion of credit that eventuates in a rise of general prices. Good economic and credit policy will endeavor to steer a middle course between these two dangerous shoals."

Daniel Willard, president Baltimore & Ohio Railway:

"The mere existence of the [unemployment] problem presents a serious challenge to our economic system." After discussing our natural and human resources, our productive capacity, and our surpluses, he added:

"And with all this surplus of wealth and resources we have millions, so it is said, in dire need of food and clothing—in short, more of everything to eat and wear than we can possibly use, and at the same time millions of human beings hungry and cold. That is another problem, although closely related to the first, and the two problems together—unemployment and the distribution of resources—bring into question the very foundations of our political and economic system."

T. B. Macaulay, president Sun Life Insurance Co. of Canada:

"That the purchasing power of currency depends on the amount of that currency and currency credits which may be outstanding can no longer be denied."

Carl Snyder, statistician, New York Federal Reserve Bank:

"It seems a blind fatuity to trust the smooth working of this vast and magnificent engine of modern industry to the chance forces of production or maldistribution either of credit or of gold. Surely we can not permit the fortunes of the nations, their happiness and welfare, to be left to the caprice of finding new gold fields in South America or California, or conversely, to their inevitable exhaustion. We may look forward, I hope, to the time when the scientific organization of currency and credit will be deemed as essential as the scientific organization of industry itself.

"Let us hasten the day; for the world-wide disorganization which is now so vividly before us seems evidence enough that, as in the long ages, gold, not science, is still the arbiter of economic destiny."

Claude L. Benner, vice president Continental American Life Insurance Co.:

"I am of the opinion that as long as basic commodity prices remain where they are at present, there can be no large increase in business activity."

H. G. Wells:

"The world requires [that money] must represent absolutely stable purchasing power."

Owen D. Young:

"The proper handling of price stability is one of the most important matters facing the capitalistic system. In it will be found the roots of those maladjustments which result in unequal and unfair distribution of wealth, in unemployment, and other serious problems."

Sir Charles Addis, director, Bank of England:

"It is simply intolerable that we should continue to sit with folded hands while industry and trade throughout the world are becoming the sport of our ineffectual monetary systems. We must be masters in our own house, the rulers, and not the slaves of money."

Frank O. Lowden:

"All classes now agree that unless there is an improvement in the general price level there can be no substantial relief from the unprecedented depression in which we find ourselves. The question therefore is a vital one. We have boasted in the past of our ability to meet new situations as they arose. To say that nothing can be done in this matter is the counsel of despair.

"Why not give heed to the opinions of the long line of eminent economists who believe that, without any disturbance to our gold standard, we have it within our power to erase some of the drastic deflation from which we are now suffering. And that deflation is the greatest in our history, and it seems to be gathering momentum all the time. The decline in bank credit has been more rapid in recent months than at any time since deflation set in. Unless some way can be found to check this contraction of credit, thoughtful students fear that we have by no means yet seen the worst."

FARM LEADERS AND FARM ORGANIZATIONS

The farm organizations of the country have realized the importance of this problem and after study of it have adopted resolutions on the subject. The American Farm Bureau Federation at its annual convention in 1921 adopted the following resolution:

"The present period of depression and the falling price level have increased the burden of taxes, interest, debts, and other fixed costs on all producers to an intolerable degree. It now requires 45 per cent more of all commodities and 70 per cent more of farm commodities to pay these costs than it did a few years ago. The long-continued deflation is crushing farmers, merchants, transportation agencies, and all manufacturers except a few most favorably situated and has caused a declining price of property to such an extent that it has largely eliminated equities and is affecting basic securities to such an extent as to seriously impair the stability of our banking and insurance institutions, thereby endangering the welfare of the general public. It is causing a lowering of all wages and salaries, which must of necessity lower the standard of living if continued.

"The principal cause of this deflation of values is monetary. When the price of any one commodity falls many causes may be responsible. When the average price level of all commodities falls with the rapidity of the last few years the principal cause is shortage of money and credit in actual use. Commodity prices are expressed in this country in terms of dollars. Every purchase and sale is the exchange of commodities for dollars. When dollars are scarce it takes a larger amount of commodities to get them. In other words, money is at one end of the balance, commodities at the other. Add to the effective supply of money and prices go up. Reduce the effective supply and prices come down. The above statements are justified and supported by the incontrovertible evidence coming from the experience of all former depressions.

"The problem divides itself into two parts: First, the restoration of the price level; second, the stabilization of the purchasing power of money.

"Two alternatives face farmers and other business interests at this time; the first is wholesale bankruptcy for farmers, industrialists, transportation agencies, and mercantile establishments and the further deflation of wages and salaries; the second is a rapid rise in the average wholesale commodity price level to a point near that at the beginning of the present deflation, thereby restoring confidence and making it possible for individuals, corporations, and governments to discharge their obligations and to proceed with their undertakings.

"All the powers of the Federal reserve system and the executive officials of the Federal Government should be used to bring about the restoration of the price level near the average level at which the present long-time indebtedness was incurred. The most important of these powers are:

"1. Open market purchases of eligible securities.

"2. Lowering of rediscount rates.

"3. Liberal interpretation of rediscount eligibility rules.

"In order to relieve the Federal reserve authorities and other agencies connected therewith from discretionary authority, we recommend and insist that the Federal reserve law be amended so as to make mandatory the exercise of these powers so far as possible and to the extent necessary to restore the average wholesale commodity price level to the point indicated.

"Permanent prosperity in this country demands that the dollar be made an accurate measure of value—that its purchasing power be always constant. This means stability of the average wholesale commodity price level instead of alternate periods of inflation and deflation, which are the principal causes of business uncertainty and depression. Fluctuation in the purchasing power of the dollar causes serious losses to debtors in periods of deflation and to creditors in periods of inflation, and benefits only the speculators.

"We recommend the following action by Congress to stabilize the purchasing power of money:

"1. Direct the Federal reserve system to use all its powers, following restoration of price level, to stabilize the purchasing power of money in so far as possible, using for that purpose all its monetary and credit powers, including currency and credit control, open-market operation, and changes in rediscount rates and in rediscount eligibility rules.

"2. Empower and direct the Federal Reserve Board to raise or lower reserve requirements of the Federal reserve banks and to raise or lower the price of gold.

"3. Broaden the rediscount eligibility provisions of the Federal reserve act."

The National Grange adopted the following resolution at its annual convention in 1931:

"The deflation of the past three years has injured farmers more than any other class of producers in the country. While the average of all wholesale products has fallen 30 per cent, the average of prices of farm products has fallen 45 per cent. This means that the burden of debts, most of which were contracted more than three years ago, and of which there is estimated to be $11,000,000,000 secured by farm mortgages, has increased 60 per cent in terms of the products which farmers sell.

"In view of this serious situation we urge upon the Federal reserve system and the Federal Government to take all steps possible to secure (1) restoration as nearly as may be of the wholesale-price average as computed by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics to the level prevailing in 1926, or the average of 1923–1928, and (2) the stabilization of the price level as nearly as practicable at that point.

"Contributing to these ends the National Grange recommends the following measures:

"1. An increased purchase in large volume of securities in the open market by the Federal reserve banks.

"2. Reduction of rediscount rates by the Federal reserve banks.

"3. Reduction of the legal minimum gold reserve rates of the Federal reserve banks to points materially below the present 35 and 40 per cent legal ratios to the end that the surplus gold in the United States may be exported without endangering the gold standard.

"4. An international monetary conference for the purpose of (a) stabilizing the gold price of silver and (b) stabilizing the purchasing power of gold in terms of the average of wholesale prices of commodities."

The executive officers of the A. F. B. F., the National Grange, and the National Farmers' Union, at a conference in January, 1932, adopted the following resolution:

"Believing that the general contraction of credit and the deflation of prices of commodities and property have gone to disastrous lengths;

"Believing further that the United States does not have to wait on Europe for a solution of its problems;

"Believing further that the United States' recovery can take place by recourse only to the soundest monetary plans;

"Believing further that the United States' depression will not cure itself but that deliberate action must be taken by its leaders;

"We request of the President, the Federal reserve system, and of Congress—

"That the Federal reserve system stop credit contraction and deflation and inaugurate credit expansion to affect the price level favorably by such liberal open-market operations as will bring about this result. This is demanded so that credit contraction, bank failures, hoarding, and other disastrous results of deflation may be halted and that the whole trend of economic affairs may be turned. Such action, in the opinion of the soundest economists, is necessary and will be effective in stopping the fall of prices, hoarding, in restoring normal values, and bringing the return of normal business and employment. Unless such action is initiated, we believe that even such measures as the Reconstruction Corporation are doomed to failure, for with continued contraction of credit on the part of the banking system they can not be successful.

"A stable price level is paramount to prosperity. We can not exist with rubber money and iron debts. Therefore we demand the adoption of effective measures to stabilize the purchasing power of money.

"That, in addition to these demands for immediate action, consideration be given to the readjustment of the entire banking and fiscal policies and structures of the United States, to the end that they may function in accord with present-day knowledge and needs and the Constitution of the United States."

Their leaders testified before the House subcommittee investigating this subject. Edward A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, stated:

"If the purchasing power of agriculture is not restored, then all other industry and commerce must get down on the level with agriculture, and we would then witness even greater disaster than we see to-day. * * *

* * * * * * *

"That is part of the picture of what will happen if the rest of this country is brought down to a level with agriculture. It is much more important that agriculture be brought up and the general level raised. It is imperative that this price level be restored, and the only way it can be restored is through providing an adequate monetary system that will fully meet the needs of trade and commerce.

"In asking that Congress give us an honest dollar we are not asking that we abandon our standard. We want gold to be back of the dollar, but we want it to be back of an honest dollar."

Louis J. Taber, master of the National Grange:

"In other words, the Congress, when it eliminated from the original Federal reserve act the instructions to stabilize the general price level, left in the hands of the Federal Reserve Board unlimited power and no definite instructions to follow. Unless the Congress makes definite provision by statute, no Federal Reserve Board can be expected to assume the responsibility of checking the forces of either undue inflation or unnecessary deflation.

"The constitutional provision that Congress shall have the power to coin money and fix the value thereof has never been fully exercised. Under modern conditions, those who have the control of credit have the power to directly affect the value of money. Unless by definite mandate, Congress instructs the Federal Reserve Board to so regulate the volume of money and credits as to stabilize commodity values at fair and reasonable levels, then it is guilty of violating a solemn trust. Everything is fine, when prices go up, but after prices go down, you hear people say it is speculation. The constitutional provision giving Congress the power to coin money, and regulate the value thereof, has never been fully understood and exercised."

John A. Simpson, president of the National Farmers' Union:

"It seems to be the universal opinion that there is not sufficient money to do the business of the country. Everybody now realizes that deflation was carried too far. Every money proposal at this time is for inflation. Economists, statesmen, politicians, and everybody now agree that price levels of commodities must be raised, all of which makes necessary an increased volume of money and credits.

"The Farmers' Union is in hearty accord with these views."

Charles R. White, president of the New York State Farm Bureau Federation, and member of the legislative committee of the American Farm Bureau Federation:

"I am in perfect accord with Doctor Warren and many others, that the value of the gold dollar should be brought into conformity with its true value; in other words, if the United States were buying gold at its true value, we would be paying about $30 an once, which would leave 15.5 grains to the dollar, instead of 22.23 grains.

* * * * * * *

"It would seem as if we ought to introduce into our monetary system a scientific method of holding the value constant. We predicate obligations, running over long periods of time, in terms of the unit of $1; and yet that dollar in its value, its purchasing power, may vary 50 or 100 per cent during that time. There is no other measure that is comparable with the dollar, so far as utility is concerned; it is something we are using millions of times every day, yet it is not resting upon any scientific basis whatever, but it affects us more than anything else in our business relationships."

Charles E. Hearst, vice president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, chairman of its legislative committee and president of the Iowa Farm Bureau Federation:

"If you stabilize the dollar down on the basis we have now, it is going to ruin labor and the farmer and every small business man in the United States—that is, if you stabilize prices down where they are now, if you stabilize the dollar at the height it is now.

"To my mind there could not be anything done so effectively to assist labor, in relieving unemployment, as the stabilization of the price level where it belongs * * *.

"* * * I agree with Congressman STRONG and some of the other men here yesterday, when they suggested that a change in policy should become public before it took effect, rather than a change of policy being put across and the public waking up and finding that a change of policy had been effective some time previous to that time, and only a few insiders knew it earlier. But I want to say, if we put into the hands of the Federal Reserve Board the option to do certain things, that is not enough, to my mind; there should be the direction there, the direction that the Wall Street bankers, these big financial institutions, can not go to their friends on the Federal Reserve Board and say to them, 'You can't, or you must do this and that.' I would like to have some definite direction to them so explicit, so definite that, when you finally adopt a policy in Congress, that group must be forced to do as the legislation specifies; and I would further like to suggest, as I did before, that the board be composed of not banking interests alone but of agriculture and all other interests and that it be a friendly group."

Charles A. Ewing, president of the National Livestock Marketing Association, but speaking in an individual capacity:

"* * * There is only one safe measure that we can depend on to preserve the few cyclic changes of commodities which are bound to occur, which are as inevitable as the coming and going of the tides and the flight of time, which the hand of man can not stay. We devised money to serve us, and its first duty is to preserve the parity of relationship and equities that exist between the debtor and creditor as they existed at the time the debt is incurred."

C. C. Talbot, president of the Farmers' Union of North Dakota:

"I want everything done that can be done, even temporarily, to save this Nation, and that is exactly what we need."

ORGANIZED LABOR

W. C. Hushing, legislative representative of the American Federation of Labor, appeared before the House subcommittee and indorsed the principles of the Goldsborough bill:

"* * * If the farmer can not get the money to buy things that labor produces, our industries are idle; and if our people are out of work and their purchasing power is decreased, we can not buy goods of the farmer. So it is all tied up, economically, between these two groups; and every time a bill was introduced in Congress which would benefit the farmers we have appeared here in behalf of those bills.

* * * * * * *

"You understand, of course, we are not financiers, and it would be foolish for us to come to the Committee on Banking and Currency and endeavor to tell you how this thing should be brought about, but we are in favor of the principles involved here, and we come here and indorse it, stand behind it heartily, and leave it to you gentlemen to figure out the details as to how it shall be made effective."

SPECIAL INVESTIGATING COMMITTEES

The so-called McMillan commission appointed by the British Parliament, made an exhaustive investigation into the monetary problem and submitted an elaborate report in 1931. It stated in part:

"275. Thus our objective should be, so far as it lies within the power of this country to influence the international price level, first of all to raise prices a long way above the present level and then to maintain them at the level thus reached with as much stability as can be managed.

"276. We recommend that this objective be accepted as the guiding aim of the monetary policy of this country. The acceptance of such an objective will represent in itself a great and notable change; for before the war scarcely anyone considered that the price level could or ought to be the care and preoccupation, far less a main objective of policy, on the part of the Bank of England or any other central bank.

"278. At the same time we see no great reason to doubt the feasibility of attaining the objective of a higher price level in due course, provided that the central banks of the leading creditor countries will work together with this end in view. No one would doubt the ability of a closed monetary system to bring about a rise of prices; in fact, it is only too easy. Thus the chief ground of hesitation is the difficulty of securing adequate cooperation among central banks, rather than any obstacle inherent in the nature of the problems. The subsequent maintenance of stability may prove more difficult, but experience alone will supply a confident answer."

A special subcommittee headed by Congressman GOLDSBOROUGH, of Maryland, was appointed by the House Banking and Currency Committee to study the monetary problem. It conducted an exhaustive investigation, culminating in a favorable recommendation of the Goldsborough bill, with the unanimous approval of the committee and an overwhelming vote of approval in the House. The Banking and Currency Committee in its report said in part:

"The Committee on Banking and Currency after a most painstaking and careful investigation by a subcommittee reached two conclusions: First, that the average price level from 1921 to 1929 would reestablish substantial justice between debtor and creditor; and, second, that a rise to the price level of 1921–1929 would make lower standards of living unnecessary, would justify salaries and wages at the pre-depression level; in short, would make unnecessary the process of painful economic readjustment which will have to be consummated if the price level is not raised.

"The committee also reached the conclusion that unless the price level were raised substantially to the point above indicated the burden of debt would not only seriously hamper production and destroy the producing class as now constituted but that the creditor class, being unable to collect their fixed obligations, would also go down in the crash."

Previously the American Farm Bureau Federation appointed a special committee in 1931 to investigate this problem. Eminent economists and industrial leaders were consulted. A report of this committee was printed in booklet form under the title "Honest Money." This report said in part:

"Two things are necessary at this time:

"1. Restore the wholesale commodity price level to a point somewhere near that at the beginning of the present deflation.

"2. Stabilize the price level at that point.

"The first is necessary in fairness to debtors and in order to prevent further wholesale defaults and bankruptcies. A large part of the outstanding indebtedness, both public and private, can not be paid on the present price level. An increase of 30 to 40 per cent in the price level would restore confidence, put men to work, stimulate business activity, and definitely put an end to the present depression. It would cause farm prices to increase faster and further than others, just as deflation caused them to fall further and faster."

The Iowa Bar Association appointed a special committee to study this problem, and this committee in its report in 1931 said in part:

"Stabilization is vital to the well-being of both possessor of money and the seller of things money will buy. During a period of inflation the owner of money finds its purchasing power reduced, and during a time of deflation the seller of goods finds his products generally bringing lower prices. The well-being of the world requires a reasonably stable money, so that upsets may be limited and the disasters that always result from such changes may be avoided."

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I also request that the House bill and the report thereon be printed following these quotations.

There being no objection, the bill and report were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

H. R. 11499

A bill for restoring and maintaining the purchasing power of the dollar

Be it enacted, etc., That the Federal reserve act is amended by adding at the end thereof a new section to read as follows:

"SEC. 31. It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States that the average purchasing power of the dollar as ascertained by the Department of Labor in the wholesale commodity markets for the period covering the years 1921 to 1929, inclusive, shall be restored and maintained by the control of the volume of credit and currency."

SEC. 2. The Federal Reserve Board, the Federal reserve banks, and the Secretary of the Treasury are hereby charged with the duty of making effective this policy.

SEC. 3. Acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the terms of this act are hereby repealed.

[House Report No. 1103, Seventy-second Congress, first session]

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 11499):

The Committee on Banking and Currency, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11499) to amend the Federal reserve act by adding at the end thereof a new section, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with recommendation that the bill do pass without amendment.

Within the scope of a committee report it is not possible to discuss in detail the technical economic principles involved in H. R. 11499, but it is possible to determine the anticipated workings of the action of the principle if it is crystalized into legislation.

The bill has two features—an emergency feature and a permanent feature. The emergency feature contemplates a rise in the general commodity price level to the average existing between 1921 and 1929, inclusive, and the substantial maintenance of that price level.

As to the emergency feature, all authorities agree, first, that it is impossible for the debts of the country to be paid at the present price level, and that unless the price level is raised the business of the country is headed for inevitable bankruptcy, and, second, that the present price level is unjust to debtors.

Speaking roughly, but with substantial accuracy, the dollar will purchase about $1.60 more of commodities than in the 1921–1929 period, and about $1.56 more of commodities than it would purchase between the period of 1918–1931 and the first quarter of 1932, inclusive. It would purchase now what it would have taken $1.25 to purchase about a year ago, which means that the producer—that is, the debtor—is being confronted with an ever-increasing burden. His debts, principal and interest, remain fixed. The commodities he sells and which would have purchased a given number of dollars when he borrowed them have decreased in their purchasing power.

To go one step farther, unemployment is constantly increasing, because on a constantly declining market business can't go on. It is impossible to produce below the cost of production.

The Committee on Banking and Currency, after a most painstaking and careful investigation by a subcommittee, reached two conclusions: First, that the average price level from 1921 to 1929 would reestablish substantial justice between debtor and creditor; and, second, that a rise to the price level of 1921–1929 would make lower standards of living unnecessary, would justify salaries and wages at the predepression level—in short, would make unnecessary the process of painful economic readjustment, which will have to be consummated if the price level is not raised.

The committee also reached the conclusion that unless the price level were raised substantially to the point above indicated the burden of debt would not only seriously hamper production and destroy the producing class as now constituted, but that the creditor class, being unable to collect their fixed obligations, would also go down in the crash.

Then the question arose as to what could be done.

The Federal reserve system, under the leadership of Benjamin Strong, former governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, measurably stabilized for several years the price level by open-market operations and by adjustment of the rediscount rates of the Federal reserve banks. The Federal reserve system has been accumulating gold at the average rate of $200,000,000 a year for about six years, and is now in a much stronger position than it was at the time of the open-market operations just referred to.

It is in a position to put into the market $4,000,000,000 in Federal reserve notes and still maintain its 40 per cent reserve requirements. By utilizing its power to lower reserve requirements of the Federal reserve banks the system could put into the market nearly $9,000,000,000 of Federal reserve notes. Either sum, if the country knew that because of a congressional mandate the Federal reserve system was going to raise the price level to the point indicated, would be much more than sufficient to raise it, because as soon as the country understood what the policy of the Federal reserve system as provided by law was confidence among banks and business men would be restored, bank loans would expand, the retailer would buy from the wholesaler, the wholesaler would buy from the manufacturer, the manufacturer from the producer of raw materials, and the masses of the people would find employment, so that through buying of securities by the Federal reserve banks and through the restoration of confidence as above indicated the normal business activity of the country would very speedily be reestablished.

Even more important than its emergency feature the committee deems the stabilizing feature of the bill. It would be the duty of the Federal reserve system under the bill, if enacted into legislation, to control the credit and currency of the country in a manner to satisfy the legitimate needs of business and prevent unwholesome and unjustified expansion. If unjustified and unwholesome expansion were controlled, periods of inflation and depression would also be controlled, because periods of deflation and depression always follow periods of unwholesome overexpansion and speculation.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, whereas this measure is of such tremendous importance to the country, it is not a cure for the agricultural situation. Something more than the enactment of this bill must be done. We must enable the farmer to take advantage of the tariff, we must make the tariff effective for agriculture. That is recognized by all. The question has been, How can that be accomplished?

Mr. President, several plans have been proposed. One of them passed Congress on two occasions, but was vetoed by the President. Several of these proposals are now before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate, but no report has been made upon any one of these measures. They are still in the committee.

Only about 36 days remain before we are to adjourn, and so far we have done nothing of a constructive character for the farmer during this session of more than five months, and we have nothing before us at this time for consideration.

We must do something for agriculture before we adjourn. If not, what are we to say to the farmer when we return? There is only one thing we can say, and that is that there is not the will in Congress to aid agriculture by constructive legislation.

ENFORCEMENT OF PROHIBITION

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, recently the Secretary of War, Mr. Hurley, and the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Jahncke, in public addresses and in the press have indicated that the President will indicate to the Republican convention that it will be agreeable to him if some sort of a wet or modification plank on the prohibition question is inserted in the Republican platform. Shortly following these utterances the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who is the chairman of the Republican National Committee, gave out a statement that the party will not do as Secretary Hurley and Assistant Secretary Jahncke have said it would do, but that the party will remain dry, or for prohibition.

It strikes me as rather an odd commentary on a democracy, that with a great question like this before the country, a question on which everybody has an opinion, and where 4,000,000 people have recently voted in a magazine poll, and various polls have been taken all over the country by newspapers, and where the question was almost evenly voted upon recently by both sides in the House of Representatives, that the President of the United States should be silent. No man in this country knows whether President Hoover is going to be for a continuance of the "noble experiment," or whether he is going to advocate some change in it when the Republican convention meets.

Are we to wait until that moment, and then, assuming that he will stand for some modification principle, accept a death-bed repentance after Congress has sat here for months and months and months and combed the whole field of possible taxation in an effort to extract a billion, two hundred million more dollars from the taxpayers of this country?

Is there anyone in this Chamber who can state where the Chief Executive stands on this question? If so, let him stand up and speak, and not wait until we have gone from the halls, and levied this tremendous burden of a billion two hundred million extra in taxes upon the people, while the bootleggers and the racketeers and the other criminals of this country grow rich and pay no income taxes and can not be convicted in the courts of the land.

In the new revenue bill it is proposed that we tax automobiles, tax radios, tax stock-market transactions, tax admissions to theaters, tax gambling, because we are going to burden the people who go to the race tracks in the State of Maryland with a Federal tax on admissions. We are going to do those things, but we must not touch this sacrosanct coterie of criminals and gangsters who have made a laughing stock of justice, who have waxed rich, who own homes in Florida and yachts, who are attempting the bribing of the courts and the police of the country. Instead we go out into all the other fields and hit the honest, hard-working business people of this country a terrific blow upon their financial heads in an effort to get more out of them.

Mr. President, a tax on 4 per cent beer alone, at the rate of the 1914 consumption, would result in our raising $500,000,000 if we put a tax of 25 cents a gallon on the stuff, and it would make all of the proposed nuisance taxes absolutely unnecessary.

As an individual, as a citizen of this country, after this session of Congress is over and after we have examined into every possible lane where we can get still another dollar from the American people, I do not want to have the Chief Executive then for the first time come out and say he favors some modification of the eighteenth amendment. If he is going to favor some modification, now is the time to favor it and not upon the deathbed, where only sinners repent, because to do so at the Republican convention would be equivalent to deathbed repentance, after we have sandbagged industry and business and individual citizens to the extent of $1,250,000,000 in this Congress, when we could get half that sum from a tax upon beer alone.

I repeat, is there one man in the whole United States, just one, who can say where the Chief Executive stands on a question which is as much debated and as much discussed, and in which there is as much interest as any other question before the American people? No; there is not one. Then tell me about leadership! Where is the leadership if upon a question of this magnitude and interest we get only silence from the White House?

What are the conditions in the country? The enforcement of prohibition is the biggest farce that ever visited any country beneath God's sun, full of graft, not only among the lower strata of political employees but reaching up into the judiciary. Murder is its handmaiden. Gangsters are in control of cities, gangsters elect Members of Congress in both branches, their support is sought by those who stand for office in our large municipal centers, where they have gotten a tremendous hold on the electorate. Is there bribery? In the first seven years over 25 per cent of the prohibition force was discharged for discovered corruption, and yet we go on pouring more money into this futile effort to try to bring some semblance of order out of it.

There is not a man in this body, not a citizen in this country, who can show one spot upon these United States where any substantial number of people live where liquor can not be obtained by any person who wants to purchase it. Name the spot if there is one. Name the State, the county, the town, the city, or even the village where one can not buy liquor. Yet in the face of all of this, this industry, illegal though it is, is not taxed a dollar, when everybody is here in protest of other taxes, saying, "In heaven's name do not put any more burden of taxation upon me. It is all I can do now to walk through the financial chaos in which this Nation is engulfed. Do not put a tax on automobiles, do not put a tax on stock transactions, do not put a tax on radios, do not tax admissions." Yet in the face of all these protests, many of which I believe are honest, we put on these oppressive taxes and allow the gangsters and the hoodlums and the racketeers, who infest our cities particularly, to reap millions of dollars, while contributing not a cent of income to the Federal Government.

If the President wants to be for a continuance of prohibition, and there are two sides to the question, I can at least admire and respect him as being sincere and candid if he will state to the American people that that is his position. If, on the other hand, he feels that the thing should be modified or altered or changed or repealed, I can admire and respect him for having a view on that side of the question. But for the President to have no view on this question is equivalent to our having no President in the White House.

I hope those men who go out seeking to curry favor with the voters for the administration now in power, when they rise and in a spirit of semisecrecy say that they have been in the counsels of the party and are privileged to say that the next convention will adopt a wet plank or a modification plank, a repeal plank or referendum plank, or whatever it may be, will speak by the book, and that we will not again witness the spectacle of having the senior Senator from Ohio rise, or give out a statement, saying, "That is not so. The President is going to be for a continuance of prohibition, and there will be no change."

Somebody is wrong. I think with all the uncertainty surrounding the executive position, the country is entitled to know now where the President stands. The President should not place himself in the position of being swayed at the last moment by impulses of expediency rather than conviction. If there is to be a wet or moist or damp or referendum plank in the next platform, now is the time to make that position known to the country, when we need revenue and when the illicit liquor business is not contributing a single dollar to the maintenance and the support of the Government, and when those who are already laboring under a tremendous burden of taxation are called upon to pay still more. Now, I say, is the time for the position of the Executive to be made known for the general welfare of the country.

I regret to make an observation which comes to my lips, and I hope I may make it in such language that it will not be offensive. It is my belief that if the Anti-Saloon League, so called, who wield some power in certain parts of the country and in my State along with others, could be put on a boat and sent to the North Pole for about a year, Congress would repeal the eighteenth amendment in 24 hours. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT (rapping for order). There must be no demonstration of any kind in the galleries.

Mr. TYDINGS. What right have we to hold ourselves out to the people of the country as being their representatives? What do we do when we assemble here? We tax the people and tax them and tax them, over and over again, and yet we run before the little groups which point their fingers at us and say, "Dare to do this and we will defeat you in the next election." Has a seat in this or any other body become so desirable that a man has to give away every ounce of his convictions, every shred of his knowledge, and every ounce of his courage in order to retain that seat? I believe that if a vote could be had in secret in this body and in the House of Representatives, this farce which we call national prohibition would not last until sundown. But we must vote in the open. Over on yonder hill sits a little group of busy reformers who have threatened everyone with dire disaster who abandons its type of prohibition. Have we ceased to represent the people of the country?

Who doubts that the Literary Digest poll was an honest poll? While it did not embrace our entire population, while perhaps the country may still be dry, who is there that doubts that the poll shows a sufficient division of sentiment to make it imperative upon us to resubmit this question to the legislatures or the conventions of the various States, to say whether the American people want more of it or whether they want less of it? How can we hold ourselves out as the representatives of the people if, in the face of that great agitation, we deny to the people the right to pass once more upon the question?

The curse of America is that it is a government of sectionalism; it is a government of minorities. Organize 10 men with a little money who can put a few advertisements in the papers or who can keep a lobby here in Washington, and almost anything can be accomplished. Fear! Lack of courage! Our political men go on the radio and tell the people "Do not lose your courage," when every ounce of their own courage has been cast overboard. Let courage assert itself in high places and the country will soon respond with courage in other places. I wonder at the patience of our people. We sit here in the city of Washington, under the shadow of the White House, where, according to the police records, five times as many persons under 21 years of age have been arrested annually for drunkenness since prohibition as in the 10-year period before prohibition, and yet we talk about enforcing prohibition in the Nation. The police map of Washington shows over 1,000 raids in the Capital of the Nation last year, and liquor found in three of these places was upon Government property. Here in every household where men assemble in a sociable way cocktails are offered and wine flows and everybody laughs at the prohibition law. All the time the people are crying for less taxes, and yet we go out and tax them more, knowing the farce and the hypocrisy and the sham and the shame of our own lack of courage, of our own lack of Americanism, of our own lack of sincerity, in continuing the wasting millions of dollars on prohibition consequences, in new prisons, and new courts and enforcement officers, and what not, which millions we draw from a people already bowed beneath an overwhelming load of taxation.

I say that in this hour of chaos, when men who think and look ahead hesitate to conjecture what the snows of next winter may witness, the people of the Nation have a right to look to the leader of the Republic, the President, and to exact from him a clear-cut, ringing, and unequivocal stand upon this all-important question. I say that it is beneath the respect due that great office, beneath the dignity of that great office, for members of the official family of the Chief Executive to go abroad and make public utterances as if they knew what they were saying, as if they were sure of the truth of what they were saying, and then for others similarly situated in the official family or semiofficial family to say just the opposite the next day.

A man can not be both for a continuance of the present so-called prohibition and for a change of the present so-called prohibition at one and the same time. As for me, humble though my part may be, I shall make an effort upon this floor when the tax bill is before us to knock out of it all of the nuisance taxes and substitute instead a tax upon beer in an effort to relieve those already oppressed by too much taxation and to get revenue from beer that flows with more volume than the Mississippi River itself contains.

We will hear from this question next fall. It has taken 10 years to awaken the public to the conditions that are now prevailing. There were 187 murders in a single year in Chicago, largely due to the prohibition racket. There was a turnover of 150 per cent in the border patrol at Detroit in a single year. But I do not have to single out Chicago and Detroit because of what went on there; such conditions are found everywhere. The question is, Where does the President stand on this question? Have we got to wait until Congress adjourns and the Republican convention assembles before we can find out where he stands, when he is faced with a new election, when Congress is not in session, when this enormous burden of taxation has been imposed, and when the deficit still exists, and when the five million to ten million of unemployed are still hunting for jobs and the farmer wants a market for his grain? Is that the kind of leadership we have a right to expect from the Chief Executive in a period of great national emergency? I am sick and tired of hearing radio speeches to the people, "Do not lose your courage," while men in Congress and in the Chief Executive's chair seem to tremble and hesitate and falter and have not the courage to say where they stand on the vital questions before the American people to-day.

We had the Wickersham Commission. It met for months. It delved into the question thoroughly. Did the President accept or repudiate the findings of his own commission? If he wanted a vehicle, if he wanted a stepping stone to come down off his high puritanical prohibition pinnacle, the Wickersham Commission furnished it.

I am not talking as a Democrat. Let me say now that some one may think I am trying to make a partisan speech to beat the Republican candidate in the fall. Far be it from me. That is the last thing in my thoughts. I have had this thing on my chest for three months. I had hoped that from the White House something would come. I have seen the equivocations day after day. I have looked for some suggestion in this great financial emergency. I can not withhold a righteous anger any longer. The President stated where he stood on the moratorium. We can have recommendations about everything else in the whole field of legislation. Why can not we have one about prohibition, either for more of it or for less of it?

I remember reading a line some time ago by a celebrated man—and I speak of it with some awe—who said that revolutions are not made by the people but by government. In this present period of silence I seem to see a meaning in that utterance that I have not grasped heretofore. Vacillation and equivocation are the things that make the people want to throw off the yoke of a false government, one that is nothing but a tissue of sophistry, platitudes, idle words, "Two chickens in every pot and two cars in every garage," "prosperity"—vague words, lacking in principle, lacking in honesty, lacking in courage, lacking in candor. Those things may go in normal times, but I venture to say now that they will not fill the bill in this period of great distress.

Mark you, these words, you who may be listening—and I dislike to make an utterance of this kind because I do not want to fire the flames of discontent—but we all know that next winter, with the impoverished condition of the country, our community funds are not going to be sufficient to carry the load. We might as well tell the truth about it now and not wait until next winter.

I make the prediction that at the next session of this Congress a bill tantamount to a dole will be introduced, and that bill will likely be passed. Why? Because, although the means of averting that disaster are at hand, they will not be utilized. Merely by the modification of the Volstead Act sufficient revenue could be obtained to inaugurate a building program which would take up a great deal of the slack of unemployment and alleviate a great deal of the distress amongst our people. We have not the money to do it otherwise; we can not get the money to do it otherwise. We may enact all the reconstruction finance laws we desire, but such laws are no good unless we have the money to pay for the buildings. I ask any Senator to rise and tell me where we are going to get the money. I do not intend to be a party to the kind of hypocrisy incident to passing such bills without any money in sight to pay the obligations of the Nation.

What good it would do the country in this hour of trouble if the President would send a message here asking both branches of Congress to assemble in the House of Representatives and at that time say to them: "Gentlemen, you all know that I was elected four years ago upon the premise that prohibition was a noble experiment. I have given it every reasonable aid, every reasonable consideration which even its most ardent supporters could exact. We all know that it is a farce; candor, honesty compel me to say that it is dragging the Nation downward. Our jails are full; our courts are congested; the bootleggers are making millions and paying no revenue, while honest men are forced to pay additional tribute to the Federal Government. Therefore, while you are considering the tax bill designed to exact another $1,200,000,000 from the already oppressed American taxpayers, my advice and recommendation is that, as an economic necessity, you at least modify the Volstead Act and secure revenue from the source which will thus be made available, and then submit the entire question to the people of the United States in the way provided by the Constitution and ask them whether they want more of prohibition or less of it."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator from Maryland would like to have that meeting in the House of Representatives?

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to see the President call the Senate and the House together.

Mr. BORAH. Under the guidance of the Speaker of the House of Representatives?

Mr. TYDINGS. I said I should like to see the President submit the question to Congress in an assembled session.

Mr. BORAH. I thought if the Speaker were there, he might also state his position.

Mr. TYDINGS. I agree with the Senator, and lest I be considered a partisan in this matter, which I hope I will not be, let me say that I think that every Member of Congress ought to let his constituents know where he or she stands on this question. There has been too much trimming; too many people have been running for office with water on one shoulder and wine on the other. It is disgusting to anybody with even a vestige or a semblance of honesty in his or her make-up. For my part, if I were a voter, I would rather vote for a "dry" who said he was dry, who said he believed in prohibition, than for one of these weasel-worded "wets" that one does not know whether he is going in the water or going up in the desert by airplane so far as prohibition is concerned.

Be that as it may, I think that, above every other consideration, the country casts its eyes down Pennsylvania Avenue to where the man who received 21,000,000 American votes resides. There is the place first of all where an expression should be heard, because if the captain does not show candor and leadership, it is pretty hard to get the first lieutenants, the second lieutenants, the sergeants, and the corporals to show courage. Without leadership no army is going to function; and, so far as leadership on prohibition is concerned, all the soft words and platitudes and high-sounding phrases and hopes which Secretary Hurley and Mr. Jahncke have uttered on the one hand to appease the "wets" or the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has uttered on the other hand to appease the "drys" are not going to deny the American people the right to make the observation that somebody is wrong.

The farmer! What is the use of talking about the farmer? It appears often as if no one really wants to help the farmer, and promises to help him are political "bunk" which is used at election time by demagogues who want to get into Congress. If we were desirous of helping the farmer, we would have helped him long ago. Every Senator here knows that the farmer sells in the lowest-priced market in the world and buys most of his stuff in the highest-priced market in the world. Are we undertaking to change that condition? Why, in three or four days the Senate is likely to enact more discriminations against the farmer; we are going to put tariff duties into the revenue bill, and those who bellow the loudest about helping the farmer will probably vote the oftenest to put him in the shade.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I am interested in what the Senator from Maryland is saying, that no one wants to help the farmer.

Mr. TYDINGS. "No one" is rather a general term. I do not mean to say that there are not exceptions, and I will say that I believe one of the sincerest exceptions to that observation is the Senator who has just risen. I do believe he wants to help the farmer, and I believe he is trying his best to do it, but his name and the name of others are not often associated together on the same measures, as I think he himself will admit. However, what I was coming to is this, that the manufacture of beer alone would consume 38,000,000 bushels of grain, 5,000,000,000 pounds of foodstuffs, annually. Now, I ask my friend from North Dakota does he want the farmer to get that market for 38,000,000 bushels of grain?

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I come from one of the States on the Canadian border. Right across the line there is in force what is known as government control of liquor. Yet during the past season the price of barley, the prices of wheat and of other grain there have been below the prices here in the United States. We all admit that prices have been low enough here in the United States, but they have been lower in Canada than they have here.

Mr. TYDINGS. What I asked was not what the price of wheat was in Canada or in the United States, but whether the Senator wanted the farmer to sell 38,000,000 bushels of grain to breweries where now they are selling practically nothing. Not only that, but, according to the figures of the Census Bureau, the breweries used 3,000,000 tons of coal in 1914. How many miners are in distress to-day? Not only that, but the breweries needed for the products emanating from them in 1914, 200,000 freight cars and several hundred locomotives. Look at the railroads to-day.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. From the remarks made by the Senator from Maryland I have gotten the impression that it is his opinion that there is more intoxicating liquor of various forms and grades and types being consumed to-day than there was in pre-prohibition times.

Mr. TYDINGS. What does the Senator think?

Mr. FRAZIER. I do not think that is so; but if the Senator from Maryland thinks otherwise, the liquors being consumed must be made out of something, and in their making coal must be used in order to obtain the necessary heat and grain must be used in order to make the liquors.

Mr. TYDINGS. Very well; let us take both sides of the proposition. As the Senator says, let us assume that there is less liquor being consumed to-day than in 1914. Then if that is so, my answer to the Senator is legalize it, and the farmers would sell more grain than they are selling now. Is not that correct?

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, if more liquors were used, there would probably be more grain required to make them.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is what I say. Then the Senator is in accord with me that the repeal of the Volstead Act would make a market for grain. And all I am asking the Senator is, Does he want to furnish this additional market to the farmers of the country who now can not sell their grain, who are burning their grain, and who will not even plant grain next year?

Mr. FRAZIER. I am frank to say that I am not looking for that kind of a market for the farmers' grain.

Mr. TYDINGS. I said the Senator wanted to help the farmer, but he does not want to help the farmer all the way down the road. He is going to leave him with 38,000,000 bushels of grain that he might sell, and which the Senator says the farmer can not sell. Furthermore, he is going to leave him with 3,000,000 pounds of sugar that he might have sold but can not sell; he is going to lessen the purchasing power of the railroad men who might be employed and who would purchase the farmers' products; he is going to leave him out of the picture; he is going to leave out of the picture the coal miners who might have mined 3,000,000 more tons of coal and thereby earned something with which to buy the farmers' wheat in the form of bread, and, in addition, indirectly, he is going to tax the farmer $500,000,000 that might have been obtained from a tax on beer which now is paying no part of the revenue of the Federal Government but which the racketeers and gangsters are getting.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield further to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I want to say that I do not agree at all with the figures the Senator cites, but I referred to the price of grain in Canada, where they have so-called government control, and the price here; and I am not convinced by any means that, if we should repeal the eighteenth amendment, the price of grain would be any higher than it is at the present time.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I ask my good friend from North Dakota if he or anybody on the other side of the Chamber can answer this question: Where does the President of the United States now stand on the liquor question or any part of it?

Mr. FRAZIER. Since the Senator from Maryland has put that question to me, let me say that I am not particularly anxious about it at the present time, and I think the Senators on the other side of the aisle should be more concerned about where the candidate for President on the Democratic ticket stands than as to the attitude of the President of the United States.

Mr. TYDINGS. Which candidate does the Senator want to know about on the Democratic side? Does he want to know about the one from Maryland? [Laughter.] If he does, I can answer the question. Does he want to know about the one from Ohio? If so, I can answer the question at this minute. Does he want to know about the attitude of the two candidates from New York? If so I can answer that question. I have now "batted 666" per cent; and if the Senator will bat 200 per cent, I will think he will have done well.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I did not say I was interested in having the Senator state how any of them stood, but at the present time it occurs to me, Mr. President, that perhaps the junior Senator from Maryland is one the "dark-horse" candidates for the Democratic nomination.

Mr. TYDINGS. I had not thought about that, but it is a good idea. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, there is a great distinction between my question to the Senator and his question addressed to me. No one of the candidates of my party is President of the United States, but the Senator's candidate is President; he is the present leader of the people, and therefore the urge is one hundred times stronger for him to speak out than it is for the man who simply aspires to leadership. As I said before—and I will say it again—there is only one great fault with this Congress. It knows what to do; it knows what should be done; but, somehow or other, there is something lacking in its ability to stand up like men in war and face the issue. Every Senator in this body and every Member of the House of Representatives and the President ought to be candid enough to those who have intrusted them with office to state in words which a 6-year-old child may understand where he or she stands on this important question.

My criticism is that with everybody in the country having an opinion upon the question, when radio addresses and statements and speeches by members of the President's Cabinet are filling the air with sound, the present leader, who asked the American people for candor and courage, is silent; and we are told that after the Congress shall adjourn and the Republican convention shall have assembled and renominated him, then, after the people have been taxed $1,200,000,000 more by this session of Congress, the great "White Father" at the White House will say where he stands on the prohibition question, when it will be too late to take any action here. I do not want to anticipate that statement; but if it is like some other statements I have read on this question, the wets will think it is wet and the drys will think it is dry, and we will have four more years of silence and do-nothing.

The great game here is not to serve the people; it is to fool the people. That is what it is. How can we say something that will vaguely indicate what we really believe in and please a part of our people, but so doll it up with sweet words that it will not offend too much those who disagree with us?

For example, "Prohibition is a noble experiment, far-reaching in purpose." It is an experiment. That satisfies the wets. It is not stationary; it is just an experiment. It is a noble experiment. That satisfies the drys. Both sides are satisfied. The wets and drys go to the polls. Result: Victory. The great game is to see how we can make both sides believe we are sincere.

I want to repeat this one observation:

The man who looks ahead at what may happen—and I sincerely hope it never will—in the succeeding months and the months of next winter, and who stands in the Senate and votes to tax the American people in the face of present-day conditions, $1,200,000,000, when right here at hand, by a simple amendment to legalize 4 per cent beer, we can get half that sum and make half that amount of taxes unnecessary, when the product is one which is being sold anyway and which is financing all crime and helping the criminal element—in my judgment the man who adopts that course in these times ought not to have a seat in this or any other legislative body.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GLENN. I notice an agitation or a movement to put a tax on wort. Is it not a fact that wort is used exclusively for the purpose of making beer?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true, Mr. President.

Mr. GLENN. It is proposed to tax wort; but people have convulsions if we mention a tax upon beer.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am glad the Senator brought out that distinction.

To show how candid we all are with our constituents, Mr. President, since prohibition, a substance has been invented that is called wort. I never have had occasion to use it, but I am told that if it is used properly it makes very good 4, 6, 8, 10, or 12 per cent beer. In the revenue bill it is proposed to levy a tax on wort. Every man here knows that the wort is going to be used to make illegal beer. We will vote for that because that is not wet; it is a solid; but, as the Senator from Illinois has just said, we will not put a tax on beer, because, of course, we could not clash with the philosophy of the eighteenth amendment.

In other words, we can get in the back door when nobody is looking, but we will not go in the front door. We have not enough courage to walk in the front door; but if we can get in the back door, the door called wort, we have no objection, even though we know that ultimately it will resolve itself into very good 6 or 8 or 10 per cent beer.

For a number of years the Government financed the making of wine which was illegal. I think I first called it to the attention of the Senate about three years ago. In the meantime we had let the wine people borrow about eighteen or twenty million dollars of the people's money, which they used to carry on an illicit business. Everybody knew it was illicit all the time; but it seems that the wine growers out West had entered into a sort of an arrangement that they were to support certain dry candidates provided the law was interpreted so that their product would not be held to be illegal.

That is all I have to say, Mr. President, except to make this concluding observation:

I can not for the life of me see how we can expect the people of this country to be courageous and to carry on through this depression and believe that "prosperity is right around the corner" and "Americanism will survive," when in high places we see cowardice and hypocrisy and sham, instead of the leadership that they have a right to expect from those who represent them.

NAVAL BUILDING PROGRAM

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 51) to authorize the building up of the United States Navy to the strength permitted by the Washington and London naval treaties.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the committee, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, line 3, the committee proposes to strike out the words "in the manner and to the extent" and insert "within the limits."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I am very much opposed to the pending bill, because it seems to me it is absolutely illogical and unnecessary at the present time. With the present financial condition in the United States and throughout the world, it seems to me it would be a waste of money to pass a measure of this kind, authorizing the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars, up to the $2,000,000,000 mark, for armament and for increasing the United States Navy.

Last year the United States Congress appropriated for the War Department and the Navy Department, in round numbers, $800,000,000. That was the largest appropriation ever made in peace times by this country or any other country on the face of the globe.

According to figures that I have from what I believe to be reliable authorities, the United States is expending in this fiscal year for Army and Navy purposes one-sixth of all the money being spent in the world for those purposes; and yet, Mr. President, it was the United States that advocated the Kellogg peace pact. It is the United States that has advocated these disarmament conferences, the cutting down of armaments, and so forth; yet we are expending more money than any other nation on earth for war purposes, and are expending practically one-sixth of all that is being spent in the world this year for such purposes.

As I recall the figures, out of every dollar being spent by the Government this year, 72 cents go for war purposes, past, present, and future; and Heaven knows we are spending altogether too much money as it is for general purposes. Out of all this expenditure this year, however, 72 cents of every dollar goes for War and Navy purposes.

I find on the desk of the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] one of the daily statements of the United States Treasury under date of May 2. There are some mighty interesting figures here. There is one paragraph headed "Receipts and Expenditures this Day," and there are some interesting totals here.

This statement gives the total ordinary receipts for the day of May 2, last Monday, as $4,126,966.50. The total of the general expenditures for the same day, right opposite this total of receipts, was $35,538,566.47. In other words, there was a deficit of $31,411,600 between the general receipts and the general expenditures on that day. Yet we are asked by this bill to authorize the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars in the future for building up a greater Navy.

On the next page of this statement some comparisons are made of the receipts for the fiscal year 1932 up to this time and the corresponding period in the fiscal year 1931. Under the head of receipts for the fiscal year 1932 I find $1,665,848,461.23. For the corresponding period in 1931 the total receipts were $2,521,433,222.06, or a difference of almost a billion dollars more last year than this year in receipts.

Now the expenditures for the same time: The total expenditures for the fiscal year 1932 up to May 2 were $3,998,083,602.15. The total expenditures for the same period in the fiscal year 1931 were $3,392,843,904.86, or a difference of practically $600,000,000.

The excess of expenditures over receipts for the fiscal year 1932 was $2,332,235,140.92. That was the deficit at the close of business on May 2, last Monday; and yet this bill would authorize the expenditure of two billions more in the course of the next 20 years in building up and renewing the United States Navy.

Mr. President, these are staggering figures, and it is mighty hard for the ordinary citizen to comprehend what they mean. It is practically impossible when we get up into the hundreds of millions. The expenditure for the Army and Navy last year was almost $800,000,000. Figuring that down a little more concretely, it means over $2,000,000 per day for the year for the upkeep of the Army and the Navy of the United States—$2,000,000 per day. It means $84,000 per hour for the year. It means over $1,400 every minute, day and night, for the fiscal year for the upkeep of the Army and Navy of the United States.

Mr. President, $1,400 a minute is twice as much as the gross income last year of the average farm family in the United States. More than twice as much money is being spent every minute by the United States Government for the Army and Navy as the gross income last year of the average farm family that feeds this Nation. Is it any wonder that the farmers are having hard times? Is it any wonder that the farmers are complaining about high taxes? Is it any wonder that the farmers are protesting because nothing is being done by Congress to relieve the farm situation? Yet we are asked to continue this great expenditure, and not only to continue it but to increase it by from seven or eight hundred million dollars to $2,000,000,000 by this bill.

It would seem to me, Mr. President, that the human race of this great world of ours ought to be capable of getting away from this continual preparation for war. People ought to be enlightened enough, intelligent enough, civilized enough to settle their disputes in some other way than by war. If such a consummation can be brought about, if we can have world peace and world disarmament, it will save hundreds of millions of dollars not only to the United States but to every other great nation in the world, although we spend by far more than any other nation spends.

I realize that it is probably useless to use much time in opposition to this bill, but I want to make a little further statement.

Some weeks ago Mr. Lester P. Barlow, an engineer and inventor of national reputation, informed me that he had worked out a plan of offensive warfare which was of such a powerful and destructive nature as to be of utmost importance to any of the world powers in event of another great war. He also stated that the value of such a method of offensive warfare would depend upon the greatest secrecy. Joint resolutions were introduced creating a secret commission to study these new methods of military offense.

Mr. Barlow openly stated he was not interested in making any money out of a proposition of this kind and that his only motive was to promote an international agreement for disarmament because of the utterly devastating results which could be obtained by the use of the information and the methods he had worked out.

After talking with various Members of Congress and others, Mr. Barlow was prevailed upon to confer with President Hoover upon his proposition, and a conference was held. According to my information, Mr. Barlow agreed to outline to the President all his secret plans and devices, provided the President would promise not to reveal the plans without Barlow's permission, except in event the United States should become involved in actual war.

Mr. Barlow's hope was that, with this information in his possession, the President might further the cause of world-wide disarmament or at least arrange for a temporary moratorium on armament by the great world powers pending further investigation of the proposed plan, and that if this moratorium could be agreed upon it would mean a saving of several hundred millions of dollars to our Nation and to other nations in this year of great depression and hard times.

The President asked for time to think over the matter, and some 15 days later the secretary to the President wrote Mr. Barlow asking him to take up his proposition with the Secretary of War.

In the intervening time Mr. Barlow had written the President, and not receiving any reply had concluded he was not interested. About two weeks after the conference with the President Mr. Barlow revealed to me his plan of offensive warfare, and I agreed not to reveal any of the identifying details. In my opinion, secrecy of the plans is very essential to their success.

I have known Mr. Barlow for some 12 years and knew of his connection with the service during the World War; that he was the inventor of the most effective bombs that were used by the United States Government during the late war, and I understand he has 14 patents protecting these inventions of aerial bombs.

From my study of various inventions having to do with so-called modern scientific warfare I had some time ago come to the conclusion that some one would perfect instruments of war which would mean practical annihilation of the great centers of population in event of another world war. It will be recalled that General Mitchell made a statement before one of the congressional committees to the effect that in event of another world war the safest place for the United States Navy would be up the Mississippi River as far as they could get. It will also be recalled that in a sham air battle staged by the air forces of Great Britain in an attack upon London the official committee which observed that demonstration of aerial warfare, lasting for several days, reported that it was absolutely impossible to prevent some of the enemy planes from passing over the city, and that with the bombs and poison gas which they could carry it would mean annihilation of the portion of the city attacked.

Mr. Barlow is frank in his statement that other military experts and engineers may have similar plans for offensive warfare already worked out. I know of no means of defense which can insure anything like adequate protection against the offensive warfare proposed by Mr. Barlow. I am also of the opinion that he is conservative in his claim of what can be done in the way of devastating and annihilating the great centers of population. He claims that within a radius of 1,000 miles of a base of supplies any great city could be practically wiped out of existence; that one of these deadly machines of destruction could utterly destroy all life and property within an area of half a mile in width and a mile in length; and that several of these machines could undoubtedly be brought to bear upon a great center such as New York City.

It is common knowledge, of course, that aircraft can be maneuvered by what are known as robots, or remote control, thus practically eliminating the factor of loss of life of the operator of the machine.

I believe it is generally conceded by great engineers and others who have made a study of the so-called scientific warfare that another World War would mean annihilation. It is also generally conceded that governments, as well as business in general throughout the world, are on the verge of bankruptcy. This is a time for retrenchment and cutting down of all unnecessary expenses, and instead of passing a bill such as the pending measure, which would mean vast additional expenditures for the United States, and probably for other nations, a moratorium should be declared on all new or additional armaments, and the whole question be considered and investigated by the great scientists of the world, looking toward total world disarmament instead of preparation for world war, such as is indicated by the bill introduced by the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate.

Mr. President, an instrument of war such as Mr. Barlow claims he has worked out, one of which would annihilate every living thing and all property in an area half a mile wide and a mile in length, is an amazing thing to contemplate. Yet I have not the slightest doubt but that there will be such destruction through some such machine in the event of another world war.

It seems to me it is time, Mr. President, to think about world peace instead of war. It is time to retrench in our expenditures instead of increasing them. It is time to consider the welfare and the wishes of the people on this war question rather than the wishes of propagandists who are advocating a larger Navy and a larger Army, who are advocating that the United States, because we are a great Nation, should have the greatest navy in the world and the greatest army in the world, and that because we are the richest Nation in the world, we should spend more money than any other nation for war purposes. Think of it, in these civilized times, in these times when we are talking of world peace and disarmament, spending one-sixth of all the money spent this year for war purposes in the world.

Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment in the nature of a substitute and ask that it be read; and at the proper time I intend to offer it as a substitute for the pending measure.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, before the substitute is read, may I suggest the absence of a quorum?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield for that purpose?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from North Dakota proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof:

That it is hereby declared to be the policy of the Government of the United States to bring about a moratorium for one year in construction of all military and naval armament and a curtailment to the greatest extent possible for one year of expenditures for other activities having as their object the preparation for war, either potential or otherwise. To the end that this policy may be effectuated the President is requested to take such steps as may be necessary to call such matter to the attention of the World Disarmament Conference now in session, or to take such other steps as may be necessary, for the purpose of entering into an international agreement to accomplish such moratorium and suspension.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I would like to offer an amendment to the amendment. After the word "naval" in line 3 I move to insert the words "land and air forces." I do this because the Army of the United States ranks No. 13 in size among the nations of the world, while our Navy rank is about equal. It would be a fraud to have naval disarmament as a disarmament agreement while all the world on land is an armed camp. Unless the nations are to cut down the land, air, and sea forces all at one time, in my judgment, disarmament will simply be a fraud. If we are to have the amendment adopted as offered by the Senator from North Dakota, I sincerely believe it should embrace the entire picture, so that our country would be then in the same position it is in to-day so far as real disarmament is concerned.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, my amendment simply provides for a moratorium for one year. I have no objection to including air and land forces. In fact, I think they would be contemplated in the amendment as I have presented it.

Mr. TYDINGS. But the Senator knows that in France, for example, they have a standing army of 500,000 men; in Italy of 380,000 men. In little Rumania they have a larger standing army than we have in the United States. Poland, Czechoslovakia, Japan, and Russia all have large military establishments on land. What is the use of talking about disarmament if it deals with only three nations when we know that all the nations are really armed camps on land? If we are going to have disarmament, and if we do not take into consideration the complete national defense picture of the nations concerned, it will be only a fraud. There is no disarmament worthy of the name unless that is done. So far as I am concerned, I am opposed to cutting down the American Navy with our small Army while large armies continue to exist in all the other countries untouched by such a proposal.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I believe the amendment would apply to Army as well as Navy expenses.

Moratoriums are rather popular at this time, and it seems to me along with the moratorium relating to the payment of foreign indebtedness for war purposes we should have a moratorium with reference to the building program for our Navy and our Army and a cutting down of expenses as far as possible for those two branches of the so-called national defense. I hope that we can have a record vote on the amendment and that it may be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota accept the modification suggested by the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. FRAZIER. As I understand the modification it is to include air forces.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Land and air forces.

Mr. FRAZIER. I am glad to accept the modification.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be modified accordingly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I wish to bring a matter to the attention of the author of the amendment. I merely desire to suggest that perhaps the word "moratorium" is not correctly descriptive of the policy which is contemplated by the amendment.

Mr. FRAZIER. What does the Senator suggest?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Perhaps the Senator would desire to use some other language. The word "truce" has been used, or "suspension" or "postponement" might be used. "Moratorium" I think is defined as a suspension of payments and does not mean a suspension of construction. I merely offer the suggestion to the Senator for his consideration.

Mr. FRAZIER. The word "suspension" is used a little farther on in the amendment. The word "moratorium" was put in because that term is used now to apply to almost anything that seeks to stop the expenditure of money.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the amendment destroys the entire purpose of the bill S. 51, which is to authorize the President of the United States to build up our Navy to the limits of the Washington and London treaties. The amendment which has been offered strikes out the entire body of the bill—it even strikes out the title—and provides for a moratorium instead. As a matter of fact, owing to our not building ships we are falling behind very rapidly so far as our relative position with other naval powers is concerned. Any kind of a moratorium, as other nations have built ships and we have not, will leave us in just so much worse a relative position at its conclusion. I certainly hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, an adequate Navy would constitute one of our principal assurances against war, and for that very reason would be our most reliable guaranty for the development of our own internal welfare. Without such guaranty and such assurance no law we might enact, no arrangement we might perfect for the well-being of our own people would possess safety or permanence. All our work within our own limits for our mutual good, for individual freedom and prosperity, for individual ownership of homes and means of livelihood, for American standards of living and progress might be crippled or nullified by our sudden engulfment in the furnaces of war. Dictatorships in government and industry, repeal of the usual safeguards of individual freedom, exorbitant taxation, impressment of property, and other measures accompanying war involve all these things in greater or less degree. Our Navy is one of the principal protections, therefore, of American prosperity, American development, and of the final beneficiary of that prosperity and development, the American home. In shielding us to the greatest possible extent from another war it is guarding us from calamities that would pauperize all language to describe.

I hardly need to remind you of what you so well know, namely, that recent inventions and discoveries in the laboratories and studies of science have developed guns and gases and explosives of such destructiveness that in the event of another conflict they will make the horrors of the last war look insignificant by comparison. I hardly need to remind you of a fact demonstrated by the last world strife, namely, that on some occasions we may not even be a party to an outbreak of war in some distant quarter of the world and yet despite every preparation and every safeguard become involved in it, together with the rest of mankind. In such event an adequate Navy will afford our best chance for the speediest termination of hostilities that may be possible and for minimum loss and destruction to us.

The principal nations are now so dependent on each other for various essentials of economic existence and so closely related, therefore, in material interests that war between two or three anywhere on the globe may start a flame that threatens all and may bring to any nation, combatant or noncombatant, whose vital transport and trade connections with the outside are suspended, disasters beyond control or calculation. In reference to the last-named possibility let me point out the fact that a nation's real line of defense is the line of supply of the materials essential to the sustenance and the civilization of its people. In this regard let it be noted that our own line of defense crosses every sea, making a navy of sufficient size, efficiency, and personnel necessary to its protection in emergencies. The same thing may be said of lines of transport which carry American surpluses to the markets of the world.

Our position is typical of that of the rest of the world. Virtually all the nations of importance, especially the leading ones, must look to foreign regions for many of the necessary materials of industry and life and for necessary disposition of surpluses. In the struggle for these materials and markets it is not surprising that friction, hostility, and suspicion frequently cloud the international sky and occasionally fill it with the thunders of potential war. Until a sense of brotherhood and mutual interest shall pervade the world through the efforts of associations like the League of Nations, the contribution of Woodrow Wilson to the welfare of humanity, the American Navy must be kept in efficient readiness to guard our own far-flung lines of existence and defense from foreign complications, foreign entanglements, and foreign interference. In protecting the United States it protects the largest single influence for world stability and world peace. The bill before us, while calling for no particular appropriation at any particular time, establishes a standard, a goal toward which to work in developing an adequate Navy. Certainly without such a standard we will be laboring in the dark in respect to one of the Nation's most vital needs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] as modified.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, let the amendment as modified be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment as modified will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert——

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, inasmuch as the amendment as proposed to be modified is about to be read, I think we should have a quorum, so that Senators who are absent may have an opportunity to hear the reading before the vote shall be taken. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No Senator having answered to his name on the roll call, the order to call the roll on the amendment will be withdrawn. The Secretary will call the roll to ascertain the presence of a quorum.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Keyes	Shipstead
Austin	Cutting	King	Shortridge

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER].

Mr. REED. May the amendment be read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from North Dakota offers the following amendments:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof:

"That it is hereby declared to be the policy of the Government of the United States to bring about a moratorium for one year in construction of all military and naval land and air forces armament and a curtailment to the greatest extent possible for one year of expenditures for other activities having as their object the preparation for war, either potential or otherwise. To the end that this policy may be effectuated the President is requested to take such steps as may be necessary to call such matter to the attention of the world disarmament conference now in session or to take such other steps as may be necessary for the purpose of entering into an international agreement to accomplish such moratorium and suspension."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to provide for a moratorium in military and naval activities."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER].

Mr. REED. I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have already been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who is necessarily absent. I understand, however, that if the Senator from Virginia were present he would vote the same way that I shall vote. Therefore, I am at liberty to vote, and I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DICKINSON. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] is unavoidably absent.

Mr. HATFIELD (after having voted in the negative). Has the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. HATFIELD. I have a general pair with that Senator. I find that I can transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS]. I do so, and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON];

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN] with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY];

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]; and

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. THOMAS] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON], the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] are absent on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 58, as follows:

YEAS—17

Blaine	Costigan	La Follette	Thomas, Okla.
Borah	Dill	McGill	Walsh, Mont.
Bulow	Frazier	Norris

So Mr. FRAZIER's amendment, in the nature of a substitute, was rejected.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I hold in my hand the amendment upon which we have just voted. A careful reading of the amendment seems to show that it is the wish of the amendment to declare it to be the policy of the United States Government to bring about a moratorium for one year in the construction of all military and naval armaments, and so on; and it seems to have no relationship to the other nations of the world. I suppose the Senator meant to have his amendment express a world-wide rather than a national wish; but I voted against it because it deals primarily with the United States alone. It would put us in the position of disarming without regard to what the rest of the world does.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, the Senator will find that at the close of the amendment it requests the President to attempt to bring about such a world-wide moratorium.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; but prior to that it says that it is the policy of this Government, without regard to what the President does, to declare a year's moratorium on all military and land armaments, regardless of what the rest of the world does.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, that was the intention.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thought the Senator had it in mind to effect some international disarmament; but, as I have read the amendment, I certainly would not vote to have the United States disarm while the rest of the world does nothing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will suspend while the Senate receives a message from the President of the United States.

A message from the President of the United States was transmitted to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—RELIEF OF ECONOMIC SITUATION (H. DOC. NO. 313)

Mr. McNARY. I ask that the message of the President be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the message, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I should not be discharging my constitutional responsibility to give to the Congress information on the state of the Union and to recommend for its consideration such measures as may be necessary and expedient if I did not report to the Congress the situation which has arisen in the country in large degree as the result of incidents of legislation during the past six weeks.

The most essential factor to economic recovery to-day is the restoration of confidence. In spite of the unquestioned beneficial effect of the remedial measures already taken and the gradual improvement in fundamental conditions, fear and alarm prevail in the country because of events in Washington which have greatly disturbed the public mind.

The manner in which the House of Representatives rejected both the revenue program proposed by the Treasury and the program unanimously reported by the Committee on Ways and Means; the character of the tax measures passed; the action of the House which would increase governmental expenditure by $132,000,000 for road building; the action further to enlarge expenditures in non-service-connected benefits from the Veterans' Bureau at the very time when the House was refusing to remedy abuse in these same services; the virtual destruction of both the national economy program proposed by the executive officials and the program of the special House Committee on Economy; the failure of the House to give adequate authority for early reduction of Government bureaus and commissions; the passage of legislation by the House placing a burden of impossible execution upon the Federal reserve system over the protest of the Federal Reserve Board; the threat of further legislation looking to uncontrolled inflation—have all resulted in diminishing public confidence and offsetting the constructive, unified efforts of the Executive and the Congress undertaken earlier in the year for recovery of employment and agriculture.

I need not recount that the revenues of the Government as estimated for the next fiscal year show a decrease of about $1,700,000,000 below the fiscal year 1929 and inexorably require a broader basis of taxation and a drastic reduction of expenditures in order to balance the Budget. Nothing is more necessary at this time than balancing the Budget. Nothing will put more heart into the country than prompt and courageous and united action in enacting the legislation which this situation imperatively demands, and an equally determined stand in defeating unwise and unnecessary legislation.

Most expeditious action is necessary if the revenues, appropriations, economy legislation, and a balanced Budget are to be attained before the beginning of the new fiscal year on July 1 next.

The details and requirements of the situation are now well known to the Congress and plainly require—

First. The prompt enactment of a revenue bill adequate to produce the necessary revenue and so designed as to distribute the burdens equitably and not to impede economic recovery.

Second. A drastic program of economy which, including the savings already made in the Executive Budget of $369,000,000, can be increased to exceed $700,000,000 per annum. Considering that the whole Federal expenditure, except about $1,700,000,000, is for uncontrollable obligations, this would represent an unprecedented reduction. Such a program to accomplish its purpose must embrace the rejection of all measures that increase expenditures unless they be for undoubted emergency; the reduction in appropriations now pending below the figures submitted in the Executive Budget on December 9 last; a reconsideration of the legislation covering those economy projects which require repeal or amendment to the laws; and an effective grant of authority to the Executive to reorganize and consolidate and eliminate unnecessary Government bureaus and establishments.

REDUCTION OF DIRECT APPROPRIATIONS

In the category of appropriations within the authority of the Appropriation Committees, those committees have given some months to devoted consideration of the Executive Budget, which, as I have said, in itself carried a reduction of $369,000,000 below the expenditures of the current year. Considering the situation in the country and a study of the results so far attained by the committees, together with a review by the executive officials, I am convinced that, subject to the inclusion of conditions mentioned later, a reduction of at least $230,000,000 below the Executive Budget can be made in the supply bills—of which some $70,000,000 or $80,000,00 may be the subject of deficiency bills at the next session. In order to effect these economies, to preserve the efficiency of the Government, and to assure the humane treatment of Government employees, authority must be given to meet emergencies which may arise from such close budgeting by the transfer of not to exceed 15 per cent of any appropriation to any other appropriation within the same department, provided no appropriation is increased more than 15 per cent, but subject to the approval of the Director of the Budget; and to suspend the leave with pay so that the 5-day week and its equivalent to salaried employees can be installed where necessary.

With the reduction proposed in the original Budget, together with the further reductions here proposed, it will be necessary to discharge 50,000 to 100,000 employees unless we divide the remaining work of the Government amongst the whole of its employees just as has been done in industry. I know of nothing more inhuman in the present situation than for the Government to add to the pool of unemployment and destitution when it is entirely unnecessary and can be provided against by the same measures which were undertaken by industry at the request of the Government itself nearly three years ago.

SPECIAL ECONOMY LEGISLATION

In the category of further economies, which can only be made by changes in laws, which would give authority to the Executive and the Appropriations Committees, many items were proposed by executive officers of the Government, and some portion of them were embodied in the bill presented by the special Economy Committee to the House of Representatives. Less than $30,000,000 direct and definite savings were covered in the bill which finally passed the House. Many of the indeterminate and indirect savings in that legislation can not be realized until late in the new year or after that.

Many of the recommendations which were rejected by the House of Representatives should again be considered. Aside from the economy proposals affecting employees which are here included in the above discussion of the supply bills there are opportunities to increase the direct savings provided for in the House economy bill from $30,000,000 to from $130,000,000 to $150,000,000, plus many indeterminate items which would result in further economies.

These savings would be over and above the amounts of savings referred to in the direct appropriations. Without going into the merits or demerits of the proposals, they do represent the correction of abuses and the curtailment of unnecessary functions of the Government and embrace items that can be dispensed with during the present critical period.

CONSOLIDATION AND REDUCTION OF BUREAUS

In the category of economies that can be made by consolidation, reorganization, and elimination of the less necessary bureaus, commissions, and so forth, the authority given in the measure passed by the House of Representatives is so restricted that it can not be made effective until late in the next fiscal year. In order to expedite this economy I earnestly recommend that the Executive be authorized to proceed immediately in the consolidation of public works and personnel, partly provided in the House economy bill; public health; merchant marine; conservation; education; munitions manufacture; Army and Navy hospitals; aviation fields; and other specific Army and Navy activities which may advantageously be consolidated for the purpose of economy and more effective administration. The savings to be made are indeterminate but very considerable. If made by Executive action within the above direction from the Congress they can be made promptly.

CONCLUSION

The imperative need of the Nation to-day is a definite and conclusive program for balancing the Budget. Uncertainty is disastrous. It must be in every sense a national program. Sectional, partisan, group, or class considerations can have no place in it. Ours is a government of all the people, created to protect and promote the common good, and when the claims of any group or class are inconsistent with the welfare of all, they must give way. Various groups and sections of the country have brought insistent and delaying pressures to bear for the adoption or rejection of various projects which would yield great economy and revenue. They have not realized that sacrifice by all groups is essential to the salvation of the Nation. They have not recognized the gravity of the problems with which we are confronted. They apparently do not know that by their actions they are imposing losses on members of their own groups and sections through stagnation, unemployment, decreased commodity prices, far greater than the sacrifices called for under these suggestions. The Government can not be dictated to by organized minorities. Such action will undermine all popular government. I know that these actions do not reflect the will of the country, and I refuse to believe that the country is unable to reflect its will in legislation.

In conclusion, let me urge the national necessity for prompt and resolute and unified action, keeping constantly in mind the larger aspects of the problem and that the necessity for these measures is born of a great national emergency. If such a program should be agreed to by the leaders and Members of both Houses it would go far to restore business, employment, and agriculture alike. It would have a most reassuring effect on the country.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 5, 1932.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The message will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, copies of the President's message which has just been read have not been made available for the study of Senators. There are some declarations in the message that are of vital importance. The President repeats the declaration that it is fundamentally necessary to accomplish the prompt balancing of the Budget by the levying of additional taxes that will be just and not oppressive.

Mr. President, one of the greatest difficulties that has been experienced in meeting the obligation to maintain a due proportion between expenditures and revenues grows out of the error—the unaccountable error—of the executive department of the Government in making unreliable estimates. The advice to balance the Budget is good; I accept it, in so far as I can do so, without qualification; but there would not have been that difference between the revenues and expenditures if the estimates heretofore submitted to the Congress with respect to prospective revenues had been even approximately correct.

Heretofore it has been pointed out to the Senate that in almost every year during the last two administrations it has been impracticable to maintain a balanced Budget for the reason that the Congress has not been supplied with the information that is essential to the accomplishment of that very important end. Now, while the question is being dealt with by the Finance Committee, and every possible source of revenue is being sought out, the Executive satisfies himself with a mere general declaration that revenue sufficient to balance the Budget must be raised, and that the additional taxes for that purpose must be just, nondiscriminatory, and not oppressive. I respectfully suggest that what is needed is not mere general advice; what is needed now worse than anything else is specific information and suggestion. It would have been helpful to the Finance Committee, it would have been helpful to the Senate and to the country had the President chosen to indicate what sources of revenue that are not being reached are, in his opinion, available.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED. I think it only fair to the administration to say that both in the Ways and Means Committee of the House and in the Finance Committee of the Senate that course was adopted. The Secretary of the Treasury appeared in each committee specifically showing where the revenue could be secured; and it is also only fair to him to say that both those committees have refused to follow that advice.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes, Mr. President; but it is fair to everyone to say that after the Secretary of the Treasury had made that suggestion, he made the additional admission that his estimates were wrong by approximately $500,000,000; and now the fact is developed that the estimate upon which the $1,000,000,000 additional revenues alleged to be necessary rests is based on the anticipation of substantial improvement in business conditions and in returns to the Treasury, which experience so far shows has not been realized and which circumstances indicate may not be realized during the present fiscal year.

The balancing of the Budget by the addition of $1,000,000,000 in increased revenue is based on the theory that beginning from the time the estimate was made some months ago there would be an upward trend in business, resulting in increased returns to the Treasury, and that before the end of this fiscal year there would come such increases in business and such augmented revenues as would make a billion dollars adequate to balance the Budget. As a matter of fact, the circumstances and evidence now establish that much more than a billion dollars will be required to accomplish the honest balancing of our Budget.

I am not speaking from a political standpoint. Let every consideration of partisan advantage be discarded, and let us all address ourselves to the one important achievement, namely, that of maintaining the national credit by making clear the fact that we do not propose to expend enormous sums of money without providing the funds out of which they shall be paid. Proceeding upon that theory, we might just as well understand now that the Budget will never be balanced by mere declarations or general expressions of a purpose to do so. The Budget will only be balanced by reducing costs and by searching out and finding the sources of revenue required to meet that end; and make no mistake about it, any additional taxes levied now will prove oppressive, and some of those proposed to be levied may prove discriminatory.

It is not possible to balance the Budget without imposing a weighty obligation or burden on the business of the country. I do not care from what source the revenue may be obtained, it is fair, no matter on which side of the Chamber we stand, to recognize now the fact that we will never accomplish the balancing of the Budget by merely declaring our general purpose to do so.

Now, with respect to the declaration regarding drastic economies, let me say that since the beginning of the session there has been recognition of the necessity for reducing Federal expenditures in both branches of the Congress. Numerous proposals have been advanced. Most of them, in so far as they have as yet been considered, have been rejected, and it is entirely true that the economy bill passed by the body at the other end of the Capitol does not accomplish satisfactory reduction in its features as a whole. The declaration in the President's message in that respect is entirely correct. But it does no good to go on talking about economy unless some specific measures for securing it are to be advanced.

The only measure the President presents is the suggestion that he, as Chief Executive, be given unlimited authority to consolidate and abolish bureaus and governmental agencies and that, if that is done, it is entirely possible to save $230,000,000. It would have been helpful if at this stage of the problem the Executive had seen fit to advise the country and the Congress as to what consolidations might be made, as to what bureaus and governmental agencies might be abolished. I wish to say now that I am willing to extend the authority asked by the President on fair conditions, and I hope the Congress will pursue that course.

It is realized that the power required to accomplish the purpose which the President has in mind is an extraordinary power, an unusual authority to grant to an Executive. At the same time, the power will remain in the Congress to correct any errors or mistakes that may be made when discovered. It would have been much more helpful in enabling the Congress to accomplish something definite if there had been submitted with the message more specific recommendations.

The statement is made that it is entirely practicable to reduce the aggregate amount of the general appropriation bills $230,000,000 below the Budget. That is to say the Executive in his message admits and declares that there can be saved $230,000,000 in excess of the amount that was attempted to be saved at the beginning of this session when the Budget was sent down. It would, of course, be helpful to us all—and in saying this I do not speak as a partisan; I speak as one who is in need of information and who is desirous of procuring it, as I must assert—it would have been very helpful if we had been informed of specific measures which, in the Executive's opinion, might have resulted in economy.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I invite the Senator's attention to the fact that while the President is recommending economies, when the Senate and the House have attempted to go below the Budget and secure economies, members of the Cabinet and heads of bureaus have done all they could to block the efforts of either the House or the Senate to bring about the economies which I think Senators and most of the Members of the House are desirous of effectuating.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What the Senator has stated seems to me to be true; and the regrettable conclusion of the matter is that while we have differed as to what may be done, and while those differences have not been harmonized, very little in a substantial way has been accomplished toward the end with which we all profess ourselves in sympathy.

Reference is made to the subject of currency expansion. It is, of course, a difficult problem to make the money volume respond to the needs of business. The Glass-Steagall bill was advanced and enacted in the belief that it would accomplish necessary and wholesome expansion, and in a measure it has accomplished that end; but the difficulty has been that the agencies to whom the process was made available have not employed that process in a liberal measure.

It would be interesting and helpful to have a specific recommendation as to how wholesome expansion is to be accomplished, and undue inflation—denounced in the message—avoided and prevented.

In making this declaration, I do not feel that I have spoken from a partisan standpoint. The President's message is shot through with declarations favoring the elimination of political considerations in the determination of these important questions, and also with intimations, if not declarations, that these important and difficult questions have been treated from a partisan standpoint by others.

Mr. President, there was never a critical time in the political history of the United States, there has never been a crisis in which the opposition party in the Congress have given such helpful support to an administration in the enactment of legislation; and that support has been given on the theory that it is the only course open to us who oppose the administration in a political way if we are to avoid those destructive conditions which so long have threatened, and which appear so imminent.

I do believe it is necessary to balance the Budget; and in order to accomplish that I think we will levy taxes which will prove very burdensome, which will cause great vexation, which will stimulate the rising tide of resentment against the Congress of the United States. Nevertheless the task must be performed. In doing it I should like to have those with whom I work feel that while my efforts may prove only partially effective, while they may prove feeble, they are well intended and earnestly made.

Mr. BYRNES, Mr. REED, and Mr. LEWIS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah has the floor. Does he yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. KING. I promised to yield for a few minutes to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. I shall continue in the morning my observations, which were interrupted by the message from the President.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, the President in his message has referred to legislation on the subject of currency expansion, criticizing that legislation. Evidently the President has reference to the Goldsborough bill, which was passed by the House on Monday of this week.

That bill merely declares that the policy of the United States is that the average purchasing power of the dollar, as ascertained by the Department of Labor, in the wholesale commodity markets for the period covering 1921 to 1929, shall be restored and maintained by the control of the volume of credit and currency, and the Federal Reserve Board is directed to carry out this policy.

It is surprising that the President should disagree with this policy—surprising because it is well understood that the Secretary of the Treasury is the adviser of the President in financial matters.

On April 25 the Secretary of the Treasury delivered an address at the annual luncheon of the Associated Press in New York City, in which address he made this statement:

> With the collapse of our banking system definitely halted and our commercial and industrial organization still in a state of extreme strain, what would appear to be required now is the stimulus of credit expansion, supported by a liberal policy of the Federal reserve system, such as it is pursuing at present, and regulated in its development by that system.

So that the Secretary of the Treasury, the adviser of the President, has declared that it appears now to the administration that there should be an expansion of credit supported by a liberal policy of the Federal reserve system.

The Secretary says that appears to him to be required now. That appeared to nearly everybody else in America two years ago. Had it appeared to the Secretary and to the Federal Reserve Board two years ago, many a home and many a business in America would have been saved.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] refers to the Glass-Steagall bill and its effect in broadening the base of credit. That was our hope at the time of the passage of that bill. The figures I have secured from the Federal Reserve Board, however, show that whereas on December 31 the Federal reserve banks had loaned to member banks $638,293,000, on April 27, last week, the amount of money loaned by the Federal reserve banks to member banks, instead of increasing, had decreased from $638,293,000 to $531,821,000, or more than $100,000,000, since the passage of the Glass-Steagall bill.

The figures as shown from the various Federal reserve banks are exceedingly interesting, because they show that with the exception of three of the Federal reserve banks there has been a decrease in loans to member banks in every one of the Federal reserve districts, so that as a result of our efforts to broaden the base there has been a contracting of the credit through the Federal reserve system.

Fortunately, the House has passed this bill, which seeks only to have the Government to declare as its policy that through the Federal reserve system there should be the controlled expansion of credit, the need for which the Secretary of the Treasury says is now apparent to the administration.

This legislation would have this policy declared by Congress, because if it has never occurred to the administration that it was essential until now, the members of the board might change their minds in the near future. The necessity exists for the Congress to declare as a policy that there should be some expansion of credit and currency controlled by the Federal reserve system, and that something should be done to prevent the continuance of the contracting of the credit which is evident from the last statement of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think the country will be encouraged by the declaration of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Democratic leader here, that there is going to be no partisanship in this most important matter of a balanced Budget, which means an increase in the revenue and a decrease in the expenses of the United States Government.

I do not believe that the country cares a whoop from which side of the Chamber come these suggestions for diminished expenses, or from which side of the Chamber come sound suggestions for raising additional revenue. I think the degree of distress in which the country is at this moment is such that interest throughout the country in our political quarrels has pretty well ceased. The country has so much trouble of its own to cope with at the present time that we merely weary people by displays of partisanship here at this time.

In recent days the foreign-exchange market has gone against us very severely. The value of the dollar as expressed in terms of other currencies has declined sharply. Yesterday $13,000,000 more of gold went out of the country. It has been increasing in recent days. The security markets have gone down. To-day bond prices went down in many cases as much as 10 points.

Why has that happened? Business is bad, but it is not markedly worse than it was a week ago. The reason for those declines has been a growing apprehension that we in Congress were talking about economy but were not doing anything about economy; that we were talking about raising the Federal revenue but were not providing sound means of doing it; that our economies are illusory, and that our increases in revenue were either wholly unsound or wholly unproductive, or both. It is because the impression has gone abroad, here and in other countries, that Congress lacked the courage to balance the Budget; that all we would do would be to talk about it, and that we would not actually accomplish it; and the apprehension that has grown, based primarily on the conviction that we lacked the courage to do our obvious duty, has been increased by recent legislation or partly completed legislation or threatened legislation, such as the soldiers' bonus bill, such as the Goldsborough bill, which passed the House. Those things have shaken confidence throughout the country and in other countries to a degree that we in Congress probably do not begin to realize.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. In a moment I shall be glad to yield, but not just at this moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator declines to yield at this time.

Mr. REED. So far as I am authorized to do so for this side of the Chamber, I am glad to join in the declaration of the Senator from Arkansas that America is not going to debase her currency nor is she going to leave her Budget unbalanced.

I am glad to join with him in saying to the world, as far as our syllables can reach it, that this is a poor time to sell America short, and that if you are going to sell anything short, you should not sell American dollars short, because they are going to stay good, the Budget is going to be balanced, and we are going to maintain a sound currency.

The proposition now pending in the House of Representatives to issue greenbacks to pay over $2,000,000,000 of so-called bonus certificates is not going to become law, and everyone on this floor knows that it is not, and the markets need have no cold chills of apprehension on that account.

The Goldsborough bill, which has been spoken of, is a bill which would require the Federal reserve system so to regulate our currency that the average of prices of more prosperous years should be maintained. The enactment of that measure would mean one of two things, either that we were going to so debase our currency that the prices of commodities expressed in that currency would seem to be equal to those of more prosperous days, or that we were not going to debase our currency but were going to try to maintain fixed prices for those commodities up to past levels.

We are not going to debase our currency so as to make prices seem higher, and the country and other countries might as well know it. I do not think we are going to enter into the incredible folly of trying to maintain prices of world-wide commodities, as expressed in terms of sound currency, because, strong as is the United States, it can not act as a dumping ground for all creation. It has been proved to us that we can not maintain the price of wheat. How, then, could we possibly pretend to maintain the prices of the whole commodity group? It can not be done, and we will not embark upon the incredible folly of trying to do it.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I would like to ask the Senator whether he has worked out any plan, in view of his very strong assertions, as to how the debtors of the Nation are to pay their debts, with the present low commodity prices, and the high prices of the dollar?

Mr. REED. The present low commodity prices are just as artificial as were the boom prices of 1929.

Mr. COUZENS. But the dollar is worth much more than it was then.

Mr. REED. Of course, just at the moment it is, just as the value of the dollar was cut in half during the last boom, and during the boom of 1920. I do not justify either condition. Both are artificial. In times of great booms, like that of 1920, with the dollar selling on a 40-cent basis, an injustice is worked out to a great group of our citizens. In times like the present, with the dollar raised in its purchasing power to several times its purchasing power of three years ago, of course, a hardship is worked on vast numbers of our citizens.

Let me say now, with all the emphasis that is in me to give, Mr. President, that if we once start to debase our currency, the first sufferers, and the worst sufferers, will be those people of moderate means who receive wages payable in money. Second will be those people of moderate means who have savings-bank accounts, payable just in dollars as such, with no assurance of the gold value except as the policy of this Government has been declared. Third, the suffering will fall upon those people who have policies of insurance, representing their savings of years, because those policies likewise will be payable in depreciated dollars.

It will not hurt the rich man, who has lands, who has shares that represent tangible property, and corporations which have tangible property. It will not hurt them. But the primary sufferer, as I have said, will be the man of moderate means. It has been proved to be so in Germany, in Italy, in France, in Great Britain, and in every country which has debased its currency. Those people have been the sufferers, and when we fight for sound currency, we are fighting for the great mass of the people of the United States.

I know it makes it easier for a debtor to pay; I will grant that. But for every debtor who pays more easily, some other human being who has his savings invested in that credit suffers. For every human being who is advantaged, some other human being loses. I do not believe that America is going to break faith with the thrifty class of the Nation.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I would like to ask the Senator to reply to my question, as to whether we are going to be able to pay our debts, in the present status of affairs?

Mr. REED. I confidently expect that we are when business revives, and it will revive. It is sometimes said about a rainstorm that all the others have stopped except the present one. So it is with depressions and slumps like the present one; they have all stopped but this one, and it will be the same as to this one.

Mr. COUZENS. That is when we are going to be able to pay off our debts, when business revives?

Mr. REED. Yes; and it is up to us to reassure business by following sound fiscal policies here, and when we shall have reassured business, immediately the credit of this Government will go to par and stay at par, and the way will be cleared for the credit of business concerns to do the same.

Mr. COUZENS. So, when business returns, all of these commodity prices with which we have to pay off our debts will rise, so that they will be somewhere around what they were when the debts were created?

Mr. REED. No; I do not expect in my lifetime to see a repetition of the ridiculous boom and the ridiculous prices which prevailed in 1929.

Mr. COUZENS. So, in effect, then, all of the people who borrowed during that period will have to pay back two or three times as much in commodities?

Mr. REED. Not two or three times as much, but foolish people like myself, who went into debt in 1929, are going to have to work longer and harder to pay those debts. That is the price of having bad judgment.

Mr. COUZENS. So, in effect, such times as these all act to the advantage of the creditor?

Mr. REED. Just as boom times work the other way. This is a world of compensation.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I am going to yield to myself for just a moment, and then I will yield to the Senator.

The Senator from Arkansas asks why the President does not submit suggestions which are more specific. I think the answer to that is perfectly obvious. He has submitted suggestions which, to my mind, are as specific as could reasonably be asked. We saw a lot of specific suggestions in the McDuffie economy bill in the House of Representatives. Among them were certain suggestions as to payments to veterans. I thought most of them were pretty reasonable. There seemed no reason why, when the Government furnished food and lodging and every kind of care to a veteran in a veterans' hospital the Government should go on paying that veteran while he was in the hospital as much as it was paying to some other man in similar circumstances who had to provide all his own food and lodging and other expenses. There seemed to be a manifest inequity there. Suggestions like that were made in the McDuffie bill; and what happened? Such a cloud of lobbyists descended upon the House, so strong was the pressure of the soldier lobby, that only about 25 per cent of the membership of the House dared to vote in favor of that obviously just suggestion. The more specific the act the stronger will be the lobby, and, apparently, at the other end of the Capitol anyway, there was not courage enough to resist it. The only way by which we will get results is by putting the power into the hands of somebody who will assume the responsibility and use it.

Mr. President, I do not often envy other countries their governments, but I say that if this country ever needed a Mussolini it needs one now. I am not proposing that we make Mr. Hoover our Mussolini, I am not proposing that we should abdicate the authority that is in us, but if we are to get economies made they have to be made by some one who has the power to make the order and stand by it. Leave it to Congress and we will fiddle around here all summer trying to satisfy every lobbyist, and we will get nowhere. The country does not want that. The country wants stern action, and action taken quickly, and that is what the President's message appeals for.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Having the great respect that I entertain for the Senator, I wonder whether he wants the statement to stand which he made, that if ever this country needed a Mussolini it needs one now.

Mr. REED. This country needs courage in public office, and it has not been getting it. I do not think that we have given the country as good service as it is entitled to expect from us. I do not think we have shown either the energy or the courage the country had a right to expect from us. That is what I mean.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I rise for the moment to address myself to a feature of the President's message just read and to a phase of its support in the address just made by the eminent Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED].

Sirs, the President of the United States is to be congratulated in having so knightly a bearer as the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania to be his sponsor. There was none who could break a lance in his cause with more grace of action or greater force of execution.

To the leader of the Democracy of the Senate, Mr. ROBINSON, must go the approval of those who indorse lofty sentiments addressed to a noble object.

Mr. President, we are moved to serious consideration by the views expressed by the President of the United States on the legislation asked. We note that the President in his message advises the Congress, particularly the Senate, against what he intimates is an element of partisanship and an aspect of politics. He beseeches that such may be avoided, and that we join together in common purpose for common good. He would have the work entered upon in the spirit of patriots for country rather than partisans of politics. We answer, "Sail on; our hearts and lives are with you."

No one could more reecho that sentiment in expression than I. In proof of that self-applied encomium I appeal to the record that I have given here in the Senate, where I have supported every measure the President of the United States has sought as the Executive of the Government.

The eminent Senator from Pennsylvania congratulates the leader of the Democracy [Mr. ROBINSON] for that he will support, and that his following will uphold, measures looking to the same spirit of patriotic achievement rather than partisan accomplishment.

Mr. President, let it be confessed that the Senate can be of no avail in carrying out any program, either of the President or of the Congress, unless it has the respect of the American public and unless it can have the support individually of the constituencies which it severally represents.

Sirs, if there is to be continued the constant slander before America issued from the mouths of occasional public men, expressed by irresponsible sources, asserting that the Congress has no patriotism in its undertakings; that its Members have no capacity for the work it assumes; that it discloses a lack of intellect in whatever it pursues, there will be discouragement and want of heart in the duty. So long, sirs, as that program of falsehood shall continue being sent out to the nations as the judgment of the country, the people will have no respect for anything we undertake. There will only follow the multiplying condemnation of everything we assume, while the misrepresentations will only bring from the citizen the usual criticism asserting that we are not respected in our own homes and country and never supported by the public. It is continuously intimated that what we do is not at the instance of patriotism and devotion but incited from the littleness of partisanship or the service of private selfishness.

Sirs, all through this country in this hour there is a detestable array of contemptible individuals, irresponsible wherever they live, whose littleness and whose importence wherever they may be are demonstrated in their assumption that they may slander this body and its membership as evidence of exalted citizenship. The carrion of this order are those who love to have themselves advertised and have found they acquire it by passing maledictions upon this body. These have learned to pronounce anathema against the Congress and the Senate. They and their record ever recall to us that they are those who, for the most part, have never been honored with a trust and whom a discriminating public have never trusted with an honor. Then, sirs, in addition to these who fascinate their vanity by imitation of the kennels—in ceaseless barking—are certain others. Who are they? Sir, I deplore to speak as I must here at this moment in the language of the Scripture, which says, "Strong is the spoken word."

The distinguished President of the United States has a little body of gentlemen who have entitled themselves in the name of "the little cabinet." They, in aggregation, are busy, going about the United States in every opportunity where political chance gives them the privilege to charge everything that is wrong or disappointing against what they call the Democracy. These traveling showmen slander the members of the Democratic legislature of the United States, both of the House and the Senate. They hold up to the country that every achievement worthy of admiration or approval is the direct work only of the Republican President or of those of his party who are supporting him; that every failure of design and every disappointment in hope is the work of those who are Democrats. Never do they concede the cooperation of the Democracy, or confide to their multitude how the Democratic Party opposition waives all its privilege to oppose and opportunity to obstruct, that in concord they might work to the common object of aiding the President and serving in citizenship the country.

Among the gentlemen who voice in behalf of the administration their whining calumnies, or explode their padded exaggerations, are select hawkers who call themselves " the little cabinet," that little army who go about through the country where privilege of exhibition is given them to heap on the Democracy discredit, which they flatter themselves is an expression of statesmanship. They, sir, can be listened to by the deceived, and our distinguished press can give them prominent position in news columns, with large illustrative headlines which gratify their vanity in its crave for publicity. These it is who are educating the country and the world to believe that the Senate is unworthy of confidehce, that its membership is unintelligible. That all of all parties lack the intellect to undertake tasks worthy of their party. They are followed by others of similar pattern, and such as these have educated the country to the point where to-day our fellow citizen considers this legislative agency as unworthy of his confidence and incapable of restoring the Nation.

If the honorable President, for whom we all have respect and wish well in his undertakings, will have the cooperation that may serve the purpose as expressed by the Senator from Pennsylvania and voiced in the President's message just read here and commented on by the leader of the minority—if the President shall enjoy the fulfillment of his hope, let him as his first undertaking be to withdraw these little gentlemen of the " puny cabinet," who are the fife and drum brigade, and summon them to return to their undertakings and maintain the common manners of gentlemen to whom are committed the tasks in behalf of the public. Let these cease maligning the Democracy who are aiding as patriots, and as they uphold their office in dignity and respect cease to take license to slander public agencies that are known as congressional legislators. Let them realize how they weaken the power of Congress to carry out the wish of the President and serve their country as faithful agents of the Nation. Sirs, in an hour like this, described by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania as " so serious in its nature as calls for careful consideration," let there be an end of that petty amusement in little things, such as has been the occupation of too many in getting laughter from the vacant mind by depicting falsely the coadjutors of the President, the Congress of the United States. Let the President and the Nation know that only with the confidence of the community restored to public officials can they proceed in their work with a feeling that when they do a good deed it will be approved, and a noble one will be rewarded with a national sense of appreciation. We can not go very far if everywhere we move the constituents we represent will be found hissing us as unclean, as lepers to legislation, unworthy as officials, and lacking in patriotism which can be characterized as desertion to duty and treason to the Chief Executive.

Therefore, to the end that we may accomplish that which is necessary in this hour, I bespeak that these officials of the administration will follow the same advice as that given in the message of the President, and refrain from that unbecoming politics, which in an hour like this is unworthy of their high state as officials. Also that they who as citizens should cease the slander of the body of legislators, let us commend to the President and to all others who now appreciate the call of patriotism, that we in union of service follow the injunction of Wolsey to Cromwell, proclaiming, " Let all the ends thou aim'st at be thy country's, thy God's, and truth's."

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, there is no Member of the Senate who believes more than I in economy in Government not only in this particular crisis but in every part of every year in every activity of Government. I yield to none in my desire that there shall be economy in Government. We may differ upon specific modes of economy, and, sir, differing upon specific modes, there may be differences expressed in our votes here. I will be for any kind of economy that I believe to be real. I have nerve enough to vote against any kind of economy that I think is a sham.

Mr. President, the Finance Committee of the Senate of the United States is meeting now for the purpose of preparing a bill which shall levy the taxes that will be essential to meet the particular crisis in which we find ourselves. I have sufficient confidence in that Finance Committee to believe that it will perform its task well. I have sufficient confidence, sir, in the Senate to believe that when the bill comes to it, no matter what may be the pressure, the pressure either from one sort of men or the pressure from another sort of great corporations—I have sufficient confidence to believe that the Senate will do its duty and will pass a bill that will meet the requirements of the hour.

But, sir, there is one thing that has been said to-day that I can not permit, from my own peculiar philosophy of government, to pass unanswered. I recognize the faults of democracy. I understand as we all understand that democracy is unwieldy. I understand as you understand, sir, that democracy moves sometimes but slowly. I realize it reaches its goal now and then only by trial and by error. But democracy, sir, represents something that is bigger, something that is higher, something that is nobler, something that is greater than that which is recognized or that which is represented by any dictator on the face of the earth.

I deny that America needs now or at any other time a Mussolini. Democracy will do the job for this great Republic of ours. To say to us that we need now or at any other time a Mussolini is but to echo the cry of every exploiter of this land. To claim that a Mussolini is demanded at this time is simply to reecho, too, the appeal of every worshiper of Mammon in this country. To claim, sir, that this Nation needs at this particular juncture a Mussolini is simply to ally ourselves with that class which in its superiority and its omniscience believes that God created it superior to any other class and that it has the bounden right to manage, operate, conduct, and manipulate this Government just as that class may demand.

I deny, sir, that we need a Mussolini. Democracy is good enough for me. It ought to be good enough for you, sir. Democracy has led us thus far upon our path of success, prosperity, and glory. Democracy has stood the shocks of all the ages that we have known this Government, shocks of every kind and of every character, shocks economic, the shocks of war, the shocks of apparent destruction—and democracy has always emerged victorious. To-day, sir, instead of with lugubrious countenance and with words that ring with fear, let us stand upon our democracy and let us say we will rise in this particular juncture of our affairs as our democracy has ever risen—we will raise to greater heights and we will be true to democracy. Democracy will ever rise to every emergency in this country, and we need no Mussolini and no dictator.

RECESS

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, May 6, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, MAY 5, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, may the glory of creation, the wonder of redemption, and the marvel of our preservation stir our thanksgiving and praise from day to day. With most grateful hearts may we meditate upon Thee for the many manifestations of an all-merciful God. O, may we know Thee, whom to know is eternal life. Bestow upon this Congress a rich induement of wisdom and understanding. Arouse our entire citizenship to a greater height of confidence and with a deep, growing sense of responsibility to a representative government. That we may have the best and avoid the worst, may all citizens know that intelligence, loyalty, and unselfishness must be the dominant notes in the progress of the Republic. Blessed Lord, sustain us more and more with clear conscience, clear vision, and broad understanding. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. Con. Res. 27. Concurrent resolution providing for the correction of an error in the enrollment of Senate bill 3584, relating to insurance corporations in the District of Columbia.

NATURALIZATION OF ALIEN VETERANS OF THE WORLD WAR

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the table the bill H. R. 6477, to further extend naturalization privileges to alien veterans of the World War residing in the United States, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I think the chairman might state briefly what the Senate amendments are.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let us have them read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

SENATE AMENDMENTS

"(b) All petitions for citizenship made outside the United States in accordance with the seventh subdivision of section 4 of the naturalization act of June 29, 1906, as amended, upon which naturalization has not been heretofore granted, are hereby declared to be invalid for all purposes."

Page 2, after line 16, insert:

"SEC. 2. (a) The seventh subdivision of section 4 of the naturalization act of June 29, 1906, as amended, is amended by striking out 'the National Guard or Naval Militia of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or the State militia in Federal service.'

"(b) This section shall not be applied in the case of any individual whose petition for naturalization has been filed before the enactment of this act."

Page 2, after line 16, insert:

"SEC. 3. The last provision in the first paragraph of the seventh subdivision of section 4 of such act of June 29, 1906, as amended, is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and the following: 'except that this proviso shall not apply in the case of service on American-owned vessels by an alien who has been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence.'"

"SEC. 4. Section 32 of such act of June 29, 1906, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subdivisions:

"'(c) If the name of any naturalized citizen has, subsequent to naturalization, been changed by order of a court of competent jurisdiction, or by marriage, the citizen may, upon the payment to the commissioner of a fee of $10, make application (accompanied by two photographs of the applicant) for a new certificate of citizenship in the new name of such citizen. If the commissioner finds the name of the applicant to have been changed as claimed, he shall issue to the applicant a new certificate with one of such photographs of the applicant affixed thereto.

"'(d) The Commissioner of Naturalization is authorized to make and issue, without fee, certifications of any part of the naturalization records of any court, or of any certificate of citizenship, for use in complying with any statute, State or Federal, or in any judicial proceeding. Any such certification shall be admitted in evidence equally with the original from which such certification was made in any case in which the original thereof might be admissible as evidence. No such certification shall be made by any clerk of court except upon order of the court.'"

"SEC. 5. So much of subdivision (a) of section 33 of such act of June 29, 1906, as amended, as reads 'Upon obtaining a certificate from the Secretary of Labor showing the date, place, and manner of arrival in the United States,' is hereby repealed."

Page 2, after line 16, insert:

"SEC. 6. Section 4 of the act entitled 'An act to supplement the naturalization laws, and for other purposes,' approved March 2, 1929, is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and the following: 'except that no such certificate shall be required if the entry was on or before June 29, 1906.'"

"SEC. 7. Despite the provisions of subdivision (a) of section 1 of the act entitled 'An act making it a felony with penalty for certain aliens to enter the United States of America under certain conditions in violation of law,' approved March 4, 1929, as amended, an alien, if otherwise admissible, shall not be excluded from admission to the United States under the provisions of such subdivision after the expiration of one year after the date of deportation if, prior to his reembarkation at a place outside of the United States, or prior to his application in foreign contiguous territory for admission to the United States, the Secretary of Labor, in his discretion, shall have granted such alien permission to reapply for admission."

"SEC. 8. The compilation of the statistics to show races, nationalities, and other information, authorized and directed to be prepared by the Commissioner of Naturalization, shall be completed and published at the same time, as near as practicable, as the publication of the statistics of the 1930 census; except that reports covering the census of 1910 shall be completed and submitted not later than January 31, 1933, and reports covering the census of 1920 not later than December 31, 1933. Such statistics shall show the records of registry made under the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to supplement the naturalization laws, and for other purposes,' approved March 2, 1929. Payment for the equipment used in preparing such compilation shall be made from appropriations for miscellaneous expenses of the Bureau of Naturalization."

"SEC. 9. The Secretary of the Treasury, upon the recommendation of the Secretary of Labor, is authorized to provide quarters, without payment of rent, in the building occupied by the Naturalization Service in New York City, for a photographic studio operated by welfare organizations without profit and solely for the benefit of aliens seeking naturalization. Such studio shall be under the supervision of the Commissioner of Naturalization."

"SEC. 10. The tenth subdivision of section 4 of the act of June 29, 1906 (ch. 3592, 34 Stat. 598), as amended by the act of May 9, 1918 (ch. 69, 40 Stat. 545; U. S. C., title 8, sec. 377), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'Tenth. That any person not an alien enemy who resided uninterruptedly within the United States during the period of five years next preceding July 1, 1920, and was on that date otherwise qualified to become a citizen of the United States, except that he had not made the declaration of intention required by law, and who during or prior to that time, because of misinformation regarding his citizenship status, erroneously exercised the rights and performed the duties of a citizen of the United States in good faith, may file the petition for naturalization prescribed by law without making the preliminary declaration of intention required of other aliens, and upon satisfactory proof to the court that he has so acted may be admitted as a citizen of the United States upon complying in all respects with the other requirements of the naturalization law.'"

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to further amend the naturalization laws, and for other purposes."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this is such an important matter that I ask the gentleman to withdraw it for a day.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman permit me to explain?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think this matter is too important to be brought up in this way. I ask the gentleman to withdraw it for to-day.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill that really extends the time of veterans of the World War to become citizens of the United States. Most of them have been in hospitals and could not have taken advantage of the citizenship which was granted by the act of Congress that expired two years ago. The Senate merely added amendments dealing with departmental matter, though of vital importance.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no harm to be done by withdrawing this for the day, and I will have to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11051) to provide for the leasing and other utilization of the Muscle Shoals property in the interest of the national defense and of agriculture, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11051, with Mr. GARRETT in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOSS. What is the status of the bill with reference to any pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. There are no pending amendments, the Clerk informs the Chair. Debate was closed on section 5 and all amendments thereto yesterday afternoon, and we now begin with the reading of section 6.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SNELL: Page 9, line 9, after the word "demands," insert the words "or prices."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I understand that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto is closed.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the situation. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SNELL. I have some more amendments which it was my purpose to offer, but as debate is closed and I can not explain them, I shall not do so.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. The lessee shall agree that in the event of war the President, on behalf of the United States, may, for the purpose of national defense, take over any or all of the property leased, subject to the right of any lessee to receive such fair and reasonable damages as it may actually suffer by reason of such taking, but not including good will, profits, or speculative or punitive damages, the amount of such damages to be determined in proceedings instituted by the lessee in the United States Court of Claims, in accordance with such rules as the court shall prescribe for such proceedings, and said court is authorized to consider such proceedings as though instituted by departmental reference and may render final judgment.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not want to take even the time that is allotted under the 5-minute rule, but yesterday a question was raised by the gentleman from Tennessee—and very properly so—as to the demand or supply of and the prices now existing as compared with recent prices for various fertilizers and fertilizer elements. Not desiring to take the time to review the situation, but still feeling it would be helpful to have the data in the RECORD, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD with reference to this subject matter some extracts from the paper known as the Fertilizer Review, which is the trade paper of the fertilizer industry, giving statistics upon this proposition. In this manner I can present the matter to the House much more briefly.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman advise us who prepared these statistics and their source.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I do not know who prepared them, but from the fact that they appear in what I consider to be a very reputable trade publication, I am assuming the correctness of them, as we do many things of that kind. I can not personally vouch for the correctness of these figures.

Mr. HARE. The gentleman says that he can not vouch for their accuracy; but still I shall not object.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object. The gentleman realizes that no table of prices as of this day will be a true picture of the fertilizer price situation in this country.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I agree with that, and having that in mind I have also shown by these figures a comparison for some years past, so that they speak for themselves.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Of course, the gentleman realizes that the Fertilizer Trust is opposed to this development at Muscle Shoals?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I have no doubt of that; and I do not speak in any way for the Fertilizer Trust or any interest connected with it in any way. I am no more in sympathy with that private industry than is the gentleman from Tennessee, or than I would be with any other highly legitimate business enterprise.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

The wholesale prices of complete fertilizers at present are less than one-third of what they were in 1919, the year the Muscle Shoals plant was finished. We have quotations on three of the leading grades of complete fertilizer for a long series of years. These grades are 3–8–3, the most popular analysis used in the Southeastern States; 5–8–7, one of the leading grades in the Northeast; and 2–12–2, which is a favorite analysis in the Middle West. If we take the simple average price of these three grades in 1919 as 100, then the average price of the same grades at the present time is only 32. Prices of other grades have declined in like manner.

A glance at the table below should convince even the most skeptical person that fertilizer prices are reasonable and that there is certainly no need either for Government competition with private industry or subsidized competition under the guise of private operation.

Wholesale prices of typical analyses of complete fertilizer, 1919–1932

NITROGEN PRICES

The tremendous increase in the production of chemical nitrogen not only in the United States but in the whole world since the Muscle Shoals plant was built is responsible for the precipitous decline in nitrogen prices in recent years. Note the following comparison of the wholesale prices of sulphate of ammonia, nitrate of soda, and calcium cyanamide, the most important chemical-nitrogen sources, in 1919 and at the present time:

	Per ton
Sulphate of ammonia:
1919	$97.50
1932 (domestic)	22.00
1932 (imported); (21 per cent of 1919 price)	19.00
Nitrate of soda:
1919	88.50
1932 (39 per cent of 1919 price)	35.40
Calcium cyanamide:
1932 (29 per cent of 1919 price)	26.00

Note also the comparative prices per unit of nitrogen (20 pounds) for these three important carriers for each January from 1919 to 1932 in the accompanying table. It will be observed that the cost of a unit of nitrogen in nitrate of soda is now 39 per cent of the 1919 price; in sulphate of ammonia the unit cost is only 21 per cent of the 1919 price, and in cyanamide it is 29 per cent of the 1919 figure.

Wholesale prices of nitrate of soda, sulphate of ammonia, and calcium cyanamide, per unit of 20 pounds of nitrogen

NORMAL FERTILIZER—SUPPLY AND DEMAND

The fertilizer industry is now operating at about one-third of capacity, and consumption during the peak year of 1930 was only about two-thirds of capacity. Can any reasonable person really believe that more fertilizer-manufacturing capacity is needed?

There are in the United States over 700 independent operators with a total of 832 plants engaged in the manufacture of fertilizers. These plants, located in more than 30 States, represent an investment of fully $300,000,000. In addition, there is invested in nitrogen plants, in the phosphate rock, sulphur, pyrites, and potash industries at least $200,000,000 more—a total investment in the industry of approximately $500,000,000.

The distribution of the plants that produce complete fertilizers is shown in the following table:

Location and number of fertilizer plants in the United States

All other	3	28	1	32
Total	205	599	28	832

There are 79 plants in Alabama and 10 in Tennessee, a total of 89 plants in the two States. Most of these plants are owned by local people and serve relatively small territories. Many are operated in connection with cotton-oil mills. All of them employ local labor. Obviously the production of complete fertilizers on such a scale as is contemplated at Muscle Shoals either by the Government or by a private lessee operating under Government subsidy, would mean that many of these local industries will be forced out of business. The money invested by local Alabama and Tennessee citizens would be lost, and local labor would have to find employment elsewhere.

SUPPLY HAS EXCEEDED DEMAND FOR 10 YEARS

Since 1920 the supply of normal fertilizer has been in excess of the demand. Consumption reached its peak in 1930, when the total quantity used in the United States was 8,214,303 tons. Of this total about 6,300,000 tons were mixed fertilizer. The balance was largely superphosphate and nitrogenous materials used by farmers for direct application or for home mixing. Yet the fertilizer industry has so much overcapacity that it could produce nine or ten million tons of mixed fertilizer, which, with the separate materials, would mean a total of eleven or twelve million tons.

Total sales of all fertilizers in the United States since 1910 are shown below:

Consumption of fertilizer in the United States, 1910–1931

	Tons
1910–1914 (average)	6,135,854
1915–1919 (average)	5,892,945
1920	7,176,754
1921	4,862,931
1922	5,669,915
1923	6,442,314
1924	6,824,911

1927	6,843,199
1928	7,985,019
1929	7,974,712
1930	8,214,303
1931	6,347,898

On account of the low purchasing power of the farmer, consumption in 1931 dropped to 6,347,898 tons, and it is the consensus of opinion of the sales managers in the industry that consumption in 1932 will not be much above 4,000,000 tons. This can only mean that many fertilizer plants are shut down at the present time and many more are producing only a fraction of their normal output. Moreover, no one is expecting agriculture to recover from the present depression very rapidly, so it will probably be several years before the peak consumption of 1930 will be reached again. This means that the fertilizer industry has a long, hard pull ahead of it. In view of this situation, what is the logic in reconditioning useless or obsolete plants or in building entirely new plants at Muscle Shoals?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

The section under consideration provides for recapture of these properties by the Government in case of war. On yesterday when I was discussing the general features of this bill under recognition for 19 minutes and was short-circuited unwittingly by the Speaker at the expiration of 12 minutes, I mentioned briefly that the former Chief of Ordnance, General Williams, two years ago stated as his opinion that there was no need of these properties for the manufacture of ammunition, either in peace or in time of war, and that General Hof, present Chief of Ordnance, in his testimony before the committee this year stated that there was no need of these properties. I wish to call to the attention of those who care to read it the testimony of General Hof, on page 482, where he states specifically that the demands for the Army and Navy for the first two years of war of a major emergency would be about 172,000 tons of nitrogen, and that on December 30, 1931, the capacity of all private plants in the country was 538,000 tons of nitrogen. This testimony goes farther to the effect that it is his opinion that he could purchase nitrogen from private establishments at a cheaper cost than it could be produced at Muscle Shoals, and further that he could obtain it much more expeditiously.

So we have the judgment of the Chief of Ordnance of the Army that this plant is not needed for war purposes in time of war. We have the judgment of one of the best-informed men in the country on fertilizer, Mr. McFarland, who was appointed by the Governor of the State of Alabama in response to a request by the President as one of a commission of three from that State to determine the policy as to the use of Muscle Shoals, that he would not wish to see the Government under any circumstances engage in the manufacture of fertilizer.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The gentleman is absolutely misquoting the Governor of Alabama.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not quote the Governor of Alabama. I am quoting Mr. McFarland, who was appointed by the Governor of Alabama as a member of a commission. He stated that under no circumstances would he like to see the Government use this plant and engage in the production of fertilizer, artificial dung. He did not use that word, but some Members of this House coming from the cities may not understand what fertilizer is. It is artificial dung.

Mr. FULMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. FULMER. Why should the fertilizer manufacturers be so opposed to this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. They are just like every other manufacturer who would be concerned should the Government enter into manufacture of their line, with no charge against cost for money invested, maintenance, or perhaps even any cost of manufacture. There is a large fertilizer manufacturer in my city whose plant is closed down. There are fertilizer manufacturers all over the country. They have invested their capital. Do they want the Government to go into the manufacture of fertilizer, as is provided for in section 14, without any provision whatsoever for deduction for maintenance cost or anything else? This permits the money of the National Government to be poured into this barrel of fertilizer, and then turned out of the spigot to be spread over the lands throughout the South, within available distances, regardless of cost. What is section 14? There is no protection whatsoever to private manufacturers of fertilizers and certainly not to the taxpayers; the section has no qualifications; it simply provides that the Government shall go into the manufacture of fertilizer and sell it, and makes no reference as to cost.

Mr. ALMON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. ALMON. Will the gentleman state where and when Mr. McFarland made that statement?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. I will tell the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes in order to reply to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ALMON. When and where did Mr. McFarland make the statement that he was opposed to Muscle Shoals being operated for the manufacture of fertilizer?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman apparently misunderstands me. Mr. McFarland stated unequivocally before the committee that he was opposed to the Government engaging in the manufacture of fertilizer. I will now state the position of the distinguished gentleman of Alabama [Mr. ALMON] before the committee, and I read now the gentleman's own testimony:

I hope you will report a bill providing for private operation without any alternative Government operation bill.

That was the position of the gentleman. Now he has reversed himself.

Mr. ALMON. I have not reversed my position. We could not get a bill like that, and I am supporting this bill. I think it is the best bill we could get.

Mr. STAFFORD. It was only by a majority of 1 that the provision for Government operation to manufacture fertilizer was agreed to.

Mr. ALMON. The gentleman did not answer my question when and where Mr. McFarland made the statement he attributed to him.

Mr. STAFFORD. Before the committee in his testimony.

Mr. ALMON. I know that he is supporting this bill to use Muscle Shoals to manufacture fertilizer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who is about to address this committee knows this subject and has lived with it for 12 or 14 years. I hope the membership will give close attention to what he has to say.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I served on the joint committee in 1926, and I heard the experts from the Ordnance Department say at that time that in five years we would not need air nitrate plant No. 2.

It is true, as the gentleman from Wisconsin says, that nitrogen is very cheap now. So is copper. In my district we are selling copper at 6 cents a pound to-day. It sold for 10 or 11 cents a year or two ago, but you would not get it for 10 or 11 cents in case of war.

Mr. McDowell, former President of the American Fertilizer Association, told the committee that during 1918 we imported from Chile 1,800,000 tons of nitrates and said we would have gone beyond 2,000,000 tons had the war continued. Our military plans for 1919 required that we bring in two million some odd thousand tons of nitrate for the war program alone plus all the products of Muscle Shoals, and plus the nitrates which would be recovered by the by-product plants, which was a very considerable output.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a very brief question?

Mr. JAMES. Not now.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Very good.

Mr. JAMES. General Hof appeared before our committee, and was asked about this matter. I wish to read this statement by Mr. McSWAIN, put in the form of a question to General Hof:

Mr. McSWAIN. In other words, wasn't there more powder consumed on the 3-day battle at Gettysburg than during the whole seven years of the American Revolution; and wasn't there more powder used in reducing the St. Mihiel salient than there was in the whole four years of the Civil War; and when the next war comes and they begin to carry bombs carrying 2,000 and maybe 4,000 pounds of explosives within them, don't you see how fast that is going to eat up nitrogen?

General HOF. It may be that we will use more nitrogen in the next war than we did in the last one, but our plans are based upon what the War Department directs us to plan. That is the mobilization of troops at a certain rate armed with certain guns and a certain rate of fire. Personally I think our figures are in excess of what the consumption will be, because I don't believe they will begin to fire as early as the rate they have contemplated.

When war comes it is not a question of what nitrates will cost, but it is a question of whether you can go down there and take this plant and commence to produce it. Why depend upon private industry? Why scrap a plant that is capable of supplying ammunition for 2,000,000 men when we have it down there and it only costs $80,000 a year to take care of, improvements and all?

I want to say, as far as the subcommittee was concerned, of which Mr. STAFFORD was a member, there is not a single provision in the leasing bill that was not approved by every member of the subcommittee, three Republicans and four Democrats, and when it reached the full committee, as far as the leasing provision was concerned——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAMES. I will; although the gentleman did not yield to me.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not a fact that in the subcommittee I was against the building of the Cove Creek Dam and fought continuously against Government operation under any and all circumstances?

Mr. JAMES. I am not talking about Cove Creek. I am talking about the leasing provisions—private leasing—and there was not a single feature of the provisions in regard to private leasing that was not approved by every single member of the committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. JAMES. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not a fact that I desired to have it at least two years, but the committee voted to make it 18 months?

Mr. JAMES. I am talking about the final vote.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am speaking of my work on the committee and my attitude with respect to the leasing provision.

Mr. JAMES. At that time some of the members wanted a 2-year lease and some wanted a lesser time, and we compromised on 18 months, but when it came to our report to the full committee the members all agreed on the leasing provision in this bill. When it came to the proposition of Government operation the vote was 5 to 2. However, as far as the private leasing provision was concerned, we recommended it unanimously, and I leave it to anybody on the committee if there was any material change made in the reports submitted by the subcommittee or the full committee.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. And the bill was read in committee, section by section, and line by line.

Mr. JAMES. Yes.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I want to make a very brief statement in reply to statements made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. How did the gentleman obtain the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman rose in opposition to the motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. GOSS. But that has already been done.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes.

Mr. ALMON. Never mind; I have obtained the floor. Have I not been recognized, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for five minutes in opposition to the pro forma amendment which was not withdrawn by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I want to deny, and do deny most emphatically, that William F. McFarland, of Alabama, ever said that he is opposed to the operation of Muscle Shoals for the manufacture of fertilizer.

He was a member of the Muscle Shoals Commission appointed by the Governor of Alabama. He made his report and testified before the Military Affairs Committee. Mr. McFarland is a high-class gentleman. He is an experienced farmer. He knows as much about fertilizer as anybody, and he is as much in favor of the operation of Muscle Shoals for the manufacture of fertilizer as any man in Alabama. While he would prefer a straight-out private operation bill, he is in favor of the passage of this bill as the best bill that could be obtained.

I want to say in answer to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] that I did introduce a bill at this session providing for private operation, and I would rather have private operation. I believe under this bill we will get private operation. I believe that President Hoover will be able to lease this plant under the liberal provisions of this bill.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALMON. Yes.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Under the gentleman's belief that there will be private operation, would the gentleman have any objection to the striking out of section 14.

Mr. ALMON. I am going to support the bill reported by the committee, because I know very well that if we do not put in the bill a provision for Government operation in the House it will be put in in the Senate, and if that is done you may not get as good a provision as is carried in section 14 of this bill.

Now, a great many Members think this is a power proposition. It is not a power proposition. It is a fertilizer and a national-defense proposition.

Somebody has said the Chief of Ordnance stated that he could buy explosives cheaper to-day than he could make them at this plant. That might be true, but if you have the plant there in running condition as a munitions plant you will get munitions of war cheaper in the event of war than you will if the Government does not provide for the operation of this plant. If you do not provide for the operation of this plant, the munition makers will no doubt profiteer as they did during the World War.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired. All time has expired on the pro forma amendment, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. Lease contracts shall contain provisions under which disputes as to the interpretation or performance of any provision of the lease shall be determined by arbitration as the parties may mutually agree.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to say that there are two very seriously contested issues to be reached in this bill. Therefore I will be compelled to ask the Chair to enforce the rule as to nonsubstantial amendments, five minutes on the side, in order that we may have sufficient time in which to debate properly the seriously contested questions ahead of us in this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. The board shall pay the maintenance and operating expenses of power facilities and all other expenses of the board from the proceeds derived from rentals and sale of power, and the balance shall be paid by the board at least annually into the Treasury of the United States, miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. As I understood the statement of the chairman of the committee a moment ago, he is opposed to using more than five minutes on each section when pro forma amendments are offered.

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes.

Mr. McGUGIN. So there is no impropriety in my using five minutes now. Mr. Chairman, not having been a Member of any previous Congress, I believe I can view this Muscle Shoals matter somewhat from the viewpoint of the outside citizen. It has been my observation—and I believe it is the feeling of the people of this country—that the Congress should be able to work out some kind of an arrangement whereby this valuable property could be utilized. For 12 years, or some such length of time, nothing has been done with this property. Up to date it stands as an evidence of the inability of the Congress to legislate on this matter. My views on this bill will be controlled entirely by a desire to assist in getting a bill through this Congress which will be acceptable to the people of this country and which will also be acceptable to the President. In keeping with his former position, I do not believe the President can possibly sign this bill with section 14 intact and with section 15 intact.

The people of this country do not want the Government to operate a fertilizer plant there. They want it to be operated by private industry. If we can not succeed in obtaining a lease, then Government operation, as a last resort, would be acceptable; but certainly not under such terms and conditions as these, where we are committing a future Congress to back up an adventure into Government operation, having no idea what the cost will be. If there ever was a time that the people of this country were willing for Government to go into private business, with no idea of the cost, certainly that was prior to the time we spent $500,000,000 on the venture of the Government's entering the cotton and wheat business.

I hope we can get this bill in such shape as to be able to pass it. It does not mean a great deal to Kansas; but if fertilizer is valuable to the Southern States, I want them to have it. I hope we can get the bill in such shape that there is some possibility of its being enacted into law. I hope my friends on the Republican side will not view this matter in a partisan way on the theory that there is some politics in the defeat of this bill, and I hope my friends on the Democratic side will not view it as a partisan measure. However, we know the President will veto the bill in its present shape, and we know there is no chance of passing it over his veto.

Therefore I appeal to the House to-day to make some concessions with respect to the section which provides for Government operation of the fertilizer plant and modify it at least to the extent that before the Government board operates it they must report back to Congress giving us some estimate of what the cost is going to be. It is bad enough for Congress to put the Government in business if it has some idea what the cost is going to be; it is intolerable for Congress to start the Government out on a private business venture with no idea and no information as to what the cost is going to be.

In order to enact a bill that may be of some benefit to southern agriculture, in order to enact a bill that will be acceptable to the people of this country, in order for Congress to handle this Muscle Shoals problem in an effective way, I appeal to you at the proper time to make some concessions in section 14 of this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman speaks as though southern agriculture alone is interested in securing cheaper fertilizer. Has the gentleman ever had occasion to examine the figures with respect to the annual consumption of fertilizer in States outside of the old South?

Mr. McGUGIN. Oh, yes; but I have no doubt——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman know how much fertilizer is used in his own State?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How much?

Mr. McGUGIN. I do not know the exact figures. I know we use a great deal of it, but when we consider transportation, I take it that the Southern States near by will be the ones most benefited by the proposed legislation. However, it is doubtful if the Government is ever going to produce fertilizer at a price reasonable to agriculture. It is certain it will not if Congress pushes the Government into the business in the slipshod fashion of no one having any idea of the cost, as provided in this bill.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for one minute out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, in the Speaker's gallery to-day the House has as its guests the minister of Norway and the intrepid Capt. Gerhard Folgero. [Applause, the Members rising.]

Captain Folgero, Mr. Chairman, has sailed his tiny craft, a replica of the old viking ships, 23,000 miles, and, in a few days, leaves the harbor of the city of Washington for a trip to Iceland, where he will participate in the dedicatory ceremonies of the statue presented by the United States Government to Iceland, and thence to Norway, his homeland. I know we all join in wishing him Godspeed. [Applause.]

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I desire in this brief time to supplement the observation made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Commercial fertilizers were practically unknown 50 years ago. They are used on lands that have been cultivated a long time, where the original plant food has been exhausted. Gentlemen living in the newer sections of the country should stop and think, for it will be but a few years when the native plant food will be consumed in practically all of the lands under cultivation in this country and artificial fertilizer will be needed in sections whose representatives are now opposing this bill.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. Yes.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Does not the gentleman realize that in a great area of this country there is no need whatever for artificial nitrogen because it is produced in ample quantity by nitrogenous crops in rotation?

Mr. HARE. That is true; but whenever a section of country finds it is cheaper from a standpoint of yield to use the artificial fertilizers in place of nitrogenous plants, I think they ought to use them. If not, the time is not far distant when the sections that are to-day using commercial fertilizer will be forced to supplant their plant food with nitrogenous plants. They will then come in competition with each other. This will be true of the section represented by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], who is opposing this bill. If farmers of my section under economic conditions are not able to buy fertilizers because of high prices, we will be compelled to adopt a new type of farming and we will go into dairying, where we will use the natural fertilizer the gentleman referred to a moment ago; and when we build up our soil to the extent we can produce feed for our cattle and our livestock, Wisconsin will be eliminated from the map as a dairy-producing State in this country because we will be able to graze and feed our cattle for 9 or 10 months in the year on natural grasses and the dairy farmers of Wisconsin and other great dairying States will not be able to compete with us.

I believe the use of commercial fertilizer in the next 50 years will be extended to every State in the Union because there are men sitting here to-day—and I call upon the learned gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON] to verify this statement—who know that 50 years ago commercial fertilizers were practically unknown in the State of Alabama; and 50 years from now those States where they have plenty of nitrogen, plenty of plant food, where no commercial fertilizers are now needed, will be clamoring for commercial fertilizer, particularly if this country is to adopt a more intensive type of agriculture and less extensive as it has been the practice in the past, because when we try to make two blades of grass grow where one grew before we are going to have to resort to artificial fertilizer.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The distinguished gentleman from Illinois has spoken of the leguminous crops and their value for fertilizer. I have here a statement from the Hon. Frank

I. Mann, of Illinois, a great authority on agriculture and agronomy, in which he says:

I do not know how cheaply nitrogen might be fixed at Muscle Shoals, but it would certainly be much cheaper than to secure it through leguminous growth.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Will the gentleman yield for a brief statement?

Mr. HARE. Let me first make a reply to the gentleman from Alabama.

There can be no doubt that in the minds of men who are familiar with agriculture, commercial fertilizer can be produced a great deal cheaper than it can be put in the soil from the growing of nitrogenous plants.

I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. The gentleman will have great trouble telling the farmers of Illinois that they can not restore nitrogen to the soil by the use of clovers and legumes cheaper than they can by fertilizer.

Mr. HARE. That may be true with the present prices, but in a few years, when we have more intensified agriculture, the gentleman will then see the difference.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. All plants, buildings, additions to existing structures, machinery, and equipment installed by and at the expense of the lessee, situated upon the property owned by the United States, except such machines and equipment as may be installed for the purpose of completing, modernizing, or replacing worn-out or defective parts of the equipment, shall from date of building or installation be and remain the property of the lessee with the right of removal, and shall be subject to all the laws of the State in which they may be situated, and the State and political subdivisions in which they may be situated shall have the power to levy and collect taxes in accordance with the normal procedure for the levying and collecting of taxes on such classes of property.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I observe in connection with the statement of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN] that this is not a matter of the negligence by Congress heretofore, because it is general information that the Congress has twice passed within the last four years this bill or a similar bill carrying much the same substance as this bill, for the benefit of American agriculture, only to have it vetoed twice by the Republican Presidents at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue.

The platform of the Republican Party claims that party to be the champion of the farmer—the butter producer, the corn farmer, the wheat farmer. These crops use very little commercial fertilizer—I wonder if the Republican Presidents heretofore have been so shortsighted that they can not understand the problems of the farmers who farm the thin soil of the South and greatly need fertilizer to energize their deeply eroded and leached lands.

I do not understand why the Executive veto power is now so strongly threatened and advocated. I can not understand why those on the other side of the aisle are against the interests of 10 per cent of the American people. I can not understand why these financial magnates who control the fertilizer industry should receive favors at the hands of the Chief Executive, rather than the farmers of the South.

My friends, it is hard to believe that President Hoover, who was given the vote of North Carolina, the vote of the State of Florida, the vote of the State of Texas—those States which are now pleading for the passage of the Muscle Shoals bill—can be so biased in the use of Executive power as to deny relief to these farmers from these and other States who are now pleading for the passage and approval of this bill. It is not a matter of Congress being derelict in its duty, it has been a matter of Presidents' vetoes heretofore, but I hope the legislation will not again be vetoed.

Why should American farmers continue to pay tribute to foreign countries for fertilizer ingredients which can be more cheaply produced at Muscle Shoals? We can produce our own fertilizer ingredients at Muscle Shoals. Consequently, it is the duty of the Congress and the President to utilize this large existing governmental investment.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I speak the sentiment, I believe, of a State which has practically never used commercial fertilizer. I think I speak the sentiment of those people as represented by that great Nebraska Senator, who I am informed is not opposed to this legislation, who knows more about Muscle Shoals than any other mortal, and who may be able to make the House bill a little better when it shall reach the Senate.

I shall support the bill on that theory. I want to do my part in representing the voice of my home people in behalf of the farming element in the South.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may consume the balance of my time out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to speak out of order for the balance of his time. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLARD. Reserving the right to object—for what purpose?

Mr. HOWARD. To give the gentleman some information I think will be very valuable to him. [Laughter.]

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, in the city of Washington to-day, from a distance has come one who has been elected to represent his State as a delegate in the National Democratic Convention. The gentleman came here and interviewed 12 Members of the House and Senate, requesting each one of them to submit to him a 100-word suggestion for a platform plank in the National Democratic Convention dealing with the whole subject of prohibition. I was one of those 12. I am not at liberty to name the others. I do not know all of them. The 100 words suggested by one of those 12 I shall now present as my own suggestion—for they are my own words—as follows:

The eighteenth amendment was not originated nor adopted as a political party proposal. Divergent opinions now prevailing with respect to that amendment call for definite decision. The only proper plan for solving the problem of retaining or abrogating the amendment lies through expression of the popular will. Disclaiming any purpose to make the settlement of this vexed question a political party issue, we pledge the official representatives of the Democratic Party to submit to the people the question of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, leaving to each of the States the privilege of dealing with the question of prohibition.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I recall, when the Beck-Linthicum proposal was under consideration, the gentleman voted in opposition to that proposal. Yet that is the substance of the position the gentleman now takes?

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, no. I did vote against the Beck-Linthicum resolution, and why? I had been on record for more than two years in favor of submitting an amendment to popular vote of the people in a lawful way, but I could not vote for the Beck-Linthicum resolution because, as I understood it, it started nowhere and ended in the same place.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Will the gentleman's proposal change that amendment?

Mr. HOWARD. It will either wipe it off the books or permanently retain it, and the question will be definitely settled.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Does the gentleman mean to say that the statement he has just given us, if voted in the affirmative, would take the eighteenth amendment out of the Constitution?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly, if the States should vote for a lawfully submitted repeal resolution. My 100 words are not offered as a repeal resolution, but simply as a suggested plank in the Democratic national platform.

Mr. MILLARD. What is the difference between the gentleman's proposal and the Beck-Linthicum proposal?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert a little poem along the same line, immediately after the remarks of the gentleman from Nebraska.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The poem referred to is as follows:

TO CONGRESS

Beer will balance the Budget;
Beer will bring bacon and bread;
Beer will brighten the beggar;
Beer will bring him a bed;
Beer will banish the bigot
Bereft of balance and blind;
Beer will benefit body;
Beer ever befriended mankind.

Beer will balance the Budget;
Beer will boost our best bond;
Beer will bedevil the broker
"Bear" ing us into despond;
Beer will be balm to the banker
By bringing big balances back;
Beer will belch smoke from our buildings;
Beer will mean billions in "jack."

Beer will balance the Budget;
Beer will be welcomed with glee;
Beer will help millions now idle—
Beer with a tax of cents three.
So why wait, O Congress! O Senate!
The Nation sits helpless and numb;
Tax beer and rout the bootlegger,
The bandit, kidnaper, and bum!

Better have bread for the babies;
Beef to stem misery's flood;
Better face facts than a theory;
Better have work than have blood!

—Forrest Rutherford.

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Nebraska may have two minutes in order that I may ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLARD. I object.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, we must get along with the consideration of this bill. I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. The amortized investment in all buildings, machinery, equipment, fixtures, facilities, appurtenances, and improvements placed, installed, or erected by the lessee upon the leased premises and used in the manufacture of fertilizer and/or fertilizer ingredients shall be and become the property of the lessor upon the termination of the lease without any payment therefor by the lessor to the lessee.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Again we have before us this hardy annual, Muscle Shoals. I have been a Member of Congress for a good many years, and this is one of those perennial growths that come to us regularly—hardy annuals they are called in my country. I can not conceive of any worse effort in the line of legislation than a serious proposition to endeavor to pass such a bill as this. Of course, the subcommittee in its wisdom has inserted section 14, which is purely a subterfuge. Who for a moment to-day will think that any group of business men will form a corporation for the purpose of making fertilizer or selling power when the supply is so tremendous for both articles as it is in this country to-day? Let George do it. In other words, put the burden on Uncle Sam and, at the expiration of 18 months, force this Government into the business of making fertilizer. Some of these new Members may not fully understand what has transpired in previous years in connection with Muscle Shoals. When I first came to Congress I was honored with being appointed upon the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. We were invited in a great form of display to make a trip down to that section of Tennessee and Alabama to inspect that river for navigation purposes. It was refused; but since that time every conceivable way has been suggested to force the operation of that property onto the Federal Government. President Wilson is responsible for the condition that we are facing here to-day. There is no question about that. It was a political game, pure and simple, and our late lamented Speaker, Nicholas Longworth, were he here to-day, could tell this House more about Muscle Shoals and the ramifications of the political side of that proposition than all the rest of us put together. He made numerous speeches in this House upon the subject, to which he gave great study.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I regret that I can not yield; I have not the time. He—Speaker Longworth—knew the true story of Muscle Shoals. He knew the Democratic effort to foist this tremendous expense on the Federal Government. He knew all the details going to make it the greatest political—I was going to say graft, but I will let gentlemen substitute any word they wish for it in their own minds—the greatest political effort to use the Federal Treasury as a means toward political ends.

That is the whole story of Muscle Shoals, and unless the House strikes out section 14, this will be an attempt to fool the American people into believing that we prefer, as the gentleman from Alabama says, private management, but knowing when we vote for it that we can not get private management and asking the Federal Treasury to assume this tremendous expense. We have expenses enough. I am a member of a committee which is trying to raise some money to pay Government expenses. There has already been one hundred and thirty-five or one hundred and forty million dollars taken from the Treasury and thrown away, supposedly for road construction, and the Ways and Means Committee is asked to try to find that additional amount of revenue. To-day you are preparing to vote for this measure, which is a raid on the Federal Treasury, of no benefit to any section of the country, of no benefit to the American farmer, of no benefit for protection in case of war, but simply a political Treasury raid. That is how I designate Muscle Shoals.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. No. I have concluded my statement.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The speech just made by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts reflects no credit upon the gentleman, either from the standpoint of tolerance or of patriotism. The gentleman attacks a dead President with reference to a great question of national defense, originated in 1916; and the gentleman offers to prove something by a dead witness. The gentleman attempts to inject into this controversy an immaterial issue, and thereby, out of the excess of his extreme partisanship, undertakes to draw the attention of his Republican colleagues away from the real merits of this proposition. For that reason and for some others which I might state, it seems to me the speech gratuitously injected into this record does no credit to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

What were the circumstances under which President Wilson and his military advisers recommended the construction of this great nitrate plant somewhere in the United States in 1916? The original act did not provide that this plant should be located in Alabama or anywhere in the South. It provided that it should be located upon the recommendation of a board of Army officers, and that the President of the United States should approve of their recommendation. We had not gone into war in 1916, but every thoughtful man in the United States of America believed that it was inevitable that we would be drawn into it. At that time, under the conditions then existing, we had no plant anywhere in the United States of America to manufacture the necessary ingredients for national defense, in the form of nitrates. In the national defense act of 1916, taking view of the probabilities that were immediately confronting us, I submit to this Congress that it was the part of wisdom [applause], it was the part of prudence, it was the part of taking into consideration the problems of anticipated national defense, that fully justified the passage of this act, which was not proposed as a partisan measure. I was not here at that time, but I think practically all of the Republicans in Congress at that time voted for this proposition, and yet now, after the lapse of all these years, after the President of the United States (who, with his advisers and with Republican help, undertook to institute this great institution for national defense, and when we did not have any nitrates, when we at that time were absolutely dependent upon Chile for our supply, when all of these improved methods and inventions of modern years had not been perfected) is dead, the gentleman from Massachusetts rises and brings into this debate a political ghost and undertakes to attack the integrity of a great President, who now lies out yonder in the shadows of the cathedral, and brings up here by innuendo some private conversation that he may have had with our late beloved Speaker in order to inject political prejudice in this issue.

I am ashamed of the gentleman, and I think, upon reflection, he will be ashamed of himself. [Applause.]

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this question and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. (a) When a lease of the Muscle Shoals properties has been effected, or if no lease be effected, when the board shall certify to the President that there is a demand for increased power for the manufacture of fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients at Muscle Shoals, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, when appropriations shall be made specifically available therefor by the Congress, to construct, either directly or by contract to the lowest responsible bidder after due advertisement, a dam in and across Clinch River, in the State of Tennessee, which has by long usage become known and designated as the Cove Creek Dam, according to plans to be approved by the Chief of Engineers, in order that the waters of the said Clinch River may be impounded and stored above said dam for the purpose of increasing and regulating the flow of the Clinch River and the Tennessee River below, so that the maximum amount of primary power may be developed at Dam No. 2 and at any and all other dams below the said Cove Creek Dam.

(b) In order to enable and empower the Secretary of War to carry out the authority hereby conferred, in a most economical and efficient manner, he is hereby authorized and empowered in the exercise of the powers of national defense and aid to navigation, and in the control of the flood waters of the Tennessee and Mississippi Rivers constituting channels of interstate commerce, to exercise the right of eminent domain and to condemn all lands, easements, rights of way, and other area necessary in order to obtain a site for said Cove Creek Dam, and the flowage rights for the reservoir of water above said dam, and to negotiate and conclude contracts with States, counties, municipalities, and all State agencies, and with railroads, railroad corporations, common carriers, and all public-utility commissions, and any other person, firm, or corporation, for the relocation of railroad tracks, highways, highway bridges, mills, ferries, electric-light plants, and any and all other properties, enterprises, and projects whose removal may be necessary in order to carry out the provisions of this act. When the said Cove Creek Dam shall have been completed, the possession, use, operation, and control thereof shall be entrusted to the Secretary of War for use as prescribed in subsection (a) of this section of this act, to promote flood control and navigation in the Tennessee River and in the Clinch River.

(c) At the expiration of 50 years the State of Tennessee shall have the right to recapture the interests of the United States in said dam and appurtenant structures, but exclusive of any barge lift or navigation appliances, by paying the United States therefor an amount equal to the net investment, as defined in said Federal water power act of 1920, as amended, made by the United States in said dam and appurtenant structures: Provided, That in the event the State of Tennessee shall exercise the right hereby conferred, the State of Tennessee and its agents shall hold and operate the same in the interest of the development of the maximum primary power at Dam No. 2 and of navigation, and subject to the provisions of the Federal water power act of 1920, as amended, to the same extent as if the same were held and operated by the United States.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McREYNOLDS: On page 13, in line 11, after the word "effected," strike out the comma and all down to and including the word "Shoals" on page 13, in line 14, and insert "after January 1, 1935."

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, in order that the Members may see at once the purpose of this amendment I will call specific attention to it. With the amendment the section will read:

When a lease of the Muscle Shoals properties has been effected, or, if no lease be effected, after January 1, 1935, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized—

And so forth.

The amendment which I have offered merely provides, if no such lease of Muscle Shoals be effected and if operated by the Government, that after January 1, 1935, the Secretary of War is authorized, when appropriation shall be made specifically for that purpose, to construct Cove Creek Dam.

It will be seen from this that we are not asking for an immediate authorization, nor would we ask for any immediate appropriation. All I desire to do by this amendment is to show that the importance of Cove Creek Dam does not lie alone upon the benefits that accrue to Muscle Shoals.

In order for the committee to visualize this condition and see where Cove Creek is located and its importance to this great Tennessee Valley, I have placed before you this map. The Tennessee River starts in east Tennessee at Knoxville, formed by a combination of the Holston and French Broad Rivers.

It flows southwesterly through Tennessee and then across the State of Alabama. It then flows northwardly across Tennessee and into Kentucky and empties into the Ohio River, a distance of some 625 miles.

Muscle Shoals is situated down here in Alabama. Cove Creek is situated some 350 miles away in the mountains of east Tennessee. My purpose is to show you the importance of that to developments which have been approved by this Congress. Congress has been generous to the people in that section, especially in the survey of the Tennessee River and its tributaries. Nearly $1,000,000 has been spent for that purpose. One hundred and eighty thousand dollars has been spent on the survey and borings at Cove Creek, and the Members of the Rivers and Harbors Committee will remember well that the reports which came before the House spoke of this as the future Ruhr district of America, of course, all depending upon the development of that section.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Gladly.

Mr. SNELL. Would the gentleman think it good business policy for us to-day to definitely authorize this large expenditure of money knowing nothing of what the demands for power will be at that time?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. It is not a question of power. I am trying to show you that the question of power does not depend alone upon Muscle Shoals. While it will be of great benefit to Muscle Shoals, while it will increase the power there 124 per cent, yet that is minor to the advantages it will give to this great section.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is presenting the views of the Tennessee delegation. This is a very important matter, particularly to Tennessee, and I ask that the gentleman may have 15 minutes more.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object—and I am not going to—I would simply say that if a similar situation arises at some subsequent stage where we desire a similar indulgence I trust there will be no objection at that time.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I do hope the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS] may have this time, because, as I say, he is speaking for the delegation and is presenting our views.

Mr. McSWAIN. I know; but we are trying to put this bill through to-day.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, then I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given 10 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Gladly.

Mr. SNELL. If this is not to improve the power down there, and to increase the power facilities, what is the purpose?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. If the gentleman from New York will wait a minute I will try to explain the matter. It is not only for power, it is for navigation, power, and flood control.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. If it is a flood-control proposition, it surely ought not to be here.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. If the gentleman from New York will just give me a little time, I will try to explain it. Congress has authorized a project for the improvement of the Tennessee River in navigation, and it is to a great extent that this improvement for navigation, which is to either be done by 32 small dams, or 6 power dams, rests to a great extent upon the construction of Cove Creek Dam. In other words, Cove Creek Dam is the key to the development of this wonderful section, as well as to the navigation of the Tennessee River.

The disposition of Muscle Shoals is minor in comparison to the great value of the building of Cove Creek Dam, not only as to Muscle Shoals but as to that wonderful section. I shall therefore discuss Cove Creek in its relation to navigation; second, to the increase of power; and, third, flood control. The estimated cost of building this dam is some $25,000,000 to $35,000,000, and when built will amount to a storage of something like 3,000,000 acre-feet of water. The building of this reservoir alone will increase in navigation at various sections of the main stream 150 per cent of its natural flow during low water; from Clinch River to Chattanooga the increase will be 1.5 feet; from Chattanooga to Hales Bar 6 feet, as it now is; Hales Bar to Widows Bar 1.6 feet; from Widows Bar to Guntersville over 2 feet, and this increase is carried on down from Rivington to Paducah of 2 feet. This may seem a small amount, but considered in connection with the dams that will have to be built, under the navigation project, to make the stream 9 feet of water, it is an immense saving in cost and makes our possibilities of navigation more certain.

For the improvement of navigation of the Tennessee River low dams are suggested, in case high dams, or power dams, are not constructed. But the Government, as well as our people, prefers the high dams, which will mean the development of our hydroelectric power.

In order to get these high dams built it is necessary to make these sites as attractive as possible, not only in the horsepower that may be developed but also to decrease the cost of the horsepower as much as possible, and this is done by the increase in power due to increase of low flow and the increase of power due to excessive high flows. The engineers' report shows that the increase in horsepower of all dams below Cove Creek would be from 100 to 110 per cent, and if I remember correctly, the Government will get the benefit of horsepower at Muscle Shoals of 124 per cent, which will not only increase the horsepower of these various dams but it will decrease the cost of horsepower, which will make the dam more inviting and should give the public the benefit of cheap electricity, which would mean the rapid growth and development of our section of the country.

As an illustration of the decrease in the cost of horsepower, let me cite the figures of the Government engineer for two places, construction cost per horsepower, without benefit of storage: White Creek $1,464, with storage $366; construction without storage, Chickamauga, $777, with storage $262. Anyone who makes any study of this whatever can see the importance of Cove Creek Dam construction. Heretofore the Tennessee River project from Muscle Shoals to Cove Creek has been considered as one project, and the report of our numerous dam sites and the development of power that could be had was based on the construction of Cove Creek Dam, and $180,000 has been spent on the survey and borings at Cove Creek. The third proposition in connection with importance of building Cove Creek Dam is flood control, in which Chattanooga and Chattanooga territory are more vitally concerned than any other section along the Tennessee River.

It is estimated that the damage caused by the December, 1926, flood was approximately $2,650,000, and the engineers further state that the total damage caused by 500-year floods on main streams and navigable tributaries is approximately $14,350,000, but that the average annual damage from all floods is $1,780,000. This does not include indirect damages, such as loss due to interrupted travel and business, insanitary conditions, and spread of disease due to overflow of towns, depreciation of land due to overflow, which is difficult to estimate. The estimated damages to Chattanooga in 1926 were $600,000, so much that the city of Chattanooga has figured on levees for its protection which would mean an expenditure of millions of dollars.

In 1926 the flood in Chattanooga did not do as much damage to that city and section as some previous floods of recent date. The danger line of floods in Chattanooga is 33 feet. The engineers' report shows that the building of Cove Creek Dam will decrease the high-water mark in Chattanooga 15 per cent. In other words, if a flood should reach the height of 40 feet under present conditions with this dam built it would only reach the height of 34 feet. It is this extra 6 feet that usually does the damage to our city. If the two dams above Chattanooga, on the Tennessee River, were built with 10-foot surcharge, there would be no floods in Chattanooga. So we people of that section and of that city are directly interested in the flood situation. We need this protection for our homes and for our people.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. Does not this bill carry an authorization of sufficient funds to carry out every purpose contemplated in the bill, so that if this bill becomes a law the gentleman will never ask for any authorization in reference to anything connected with the bill? The only thing the gentleman will do will be to go before the Appropriations Committee and get the money.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. It does not so provide.

Mr. MICHENER. Show me where it does not.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. You asked me, and I will explain it. I will read you what it says, or the gentleman from Michigan may read it for himself. Do not read it in my time, however. The provision leaves it to a board to pass upon, and when the board certifies that the dam should be built, then the authorization can be made. I do not want to leave it to the board, because I think it is minor as compared to the great improvement of that valley. A gentleman sits before me, Mr. HULL of Illinois, a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, who knows the importance of the Cove Creek Dam. That gentleman knows that it is the key to the development of the whole situation in that entire section of the country.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Is it not the purpose of the gentleman's amendment to eliminate giving the board sole authority to say when this dam shall be constructed?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman is correct. We do not want to rely upon the recommendation of the board.

Mr. DAVIS. Is it not a fact that the gentleman's proposal has already been approved by both the House and the Senate in connection with previous bills?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. This proposal has been in every bill and passed in every bill that has gone out of this House and out of the Senate. This is the first time that anyone ever undertook to leave it to a board.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I do not understand what the gentleman's amendment is unless it is to eliminate this from this bill.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. It is to eliminate from the bill that provision which requires the board's recommendation for authorization for an appropriation to build Cove Creek Dam in case Muscle Shoals is not leased. I would never come before this House when conditions are such as they are now and ask for an appropriation. I am one of those who want to cut down appropriations. I am one of those who want to protect the Federal Government. We have had authorizations made in reference to the development of the Tennessee River but we are not asking for any appropriation for that purpose at this time, although the project has been adopted by this House. We do not want the authorization for the building of the Cove Creek Dam left to the recommendation of a board. This is a development which affects the whole Tennessee Valley section. My amendment does not ask for anything unreasonable. It puts it in the future and it is not asking anything except that which is just and right.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Is it not a fact that this is the first time we have ever set up a board to operate the whole proposition as far as Muscle Shoals is concerned?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I think that is true.

Mr. SNELL. Does not the gentleman think the men who make up that board would know more about the real need of it than anybody else?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. But the gentleman can not seem to recognize the importance of this dam to the whole development of that section, except as a part of the Muscle Shoals proposition. While the need for the development of Muscle Shoals is great it is really minor when taken in connection with the development of the Tennessee Valley, in connection with navigation, and in connection with flood control.

I want to say to my friends in the House that I have never been more earnest about any proposition or more interested in any legislative matter than I am in this. I ask your aid, because I think it is just and right. It is just to my people, and it is just to my section. I appeal to those here from the East, who secured the Cape Cod Canal; I appeal to you from the West, who secured your Boulder Dam, which is to cost nearly $200,000,000; and I appeal to you from the Middle West, where you were accorded relief in connection with flood control. We are only asking for an authorization, not now but in the future, so that we may have these important developments, which have already been approved.

Mr. BYRNS. And some other Congress will have to act upon it before we can go ahead with it.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes. It will have to come before another Congress, before the Appropriations Committee, and before the Budget also. It is a reasonable request, and I hope this committee will adopt this amendment.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. There is no Member of the House more interested in Cove Creek Dam than I am. I challenge nothing which has been stated as to the importance of Cove Creek Dam nor any other statement made by the gentleman from Tennessee as to the necessity of the Government building the Cove Creek Dam at some future date. You will note that the gentleman undertakes to fix the authorization in 1935. I believe the building of this dam is so meritorious that it will always stand by itself, because when you, as you certainly will, in future undertake to develop the Tennessee River as it should be for navigation, power, and flood control, this dam will be found indispensable and the Government alone should build it. So, I repeat, I rise not to take issue with the gentleman from Tennessee as to the importance of having Cove Creek Dam built by the Government in the future.

The committee in framing this bill well knew there were many differences of opinion as to Muscle Shoals both in the House and in the Senate. Recognizing that, they have striven hard to write a bill which they feel fairly represents and protects the real matters of vital importance without doing violence to certain details as to which differences exist. In reference to Cove Creek the committee has submitted two provisos or conditions that will make possible the building of the Cove Creek Dam when such conditions happen. The committee evidently did not feel at this time it could consistently do more. For that reason I believe it would be dangerous to graft any further amendments on this bill. To do so might endanger the passage of the bill, and I know the gentleman from Tennessee, who has spoken so eloquently and so forcefully in favor of Cove Creek Dam, wishes to avoid that. He wants this bill passed as much as I do, and we must avoid doing anything that will endanger its passage. There are several provisions of the bill which are not in conformity with my individual views, but no Member can ever hope on this controversial subject to have his views in their entirety adopted by this or any future Congress.

The gentleman is not asking for authorization to be effective before 1935. Remember that the Congress to be elected in November will have passed out before that date. The proposal is so meritorious you can depend on this, that at the proper time—probably in 1935—it may be earlier—Congress, when it is presented as a separate proposition, will have an opportunity to consider it on its merits, and I have no fear that unfavorable action will be taken thereon. [Applause.]

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact I am informed there will be an amendment offered to strike out this entire section, I think it would narrow the issue and simplify matters if we would vote upon the pending amendment, in the nature of a perfecting amendment, and clear the decks for the main fight.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS].

The question was taken and on a division (demanded by Mr. McREYNOLDS) there were—ayes 29, noes 72.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee: On page 13, strike out all of subsection (a) of section 11, and add a new subsection 11(a), as follows:

"The sum of $5,000,000 is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the construction of a dam in and across Clinch River in the State of Tennessee, which has by long usage become known and designated as Cove Creek Dam, according to plans to be approved by the Chief of Engineers, in order that the waters of the said Clinch River may be impounded and stored above said dam for the purpose of increasing and regulating the flow of the Clinch River and the Tennessee River below, so that the maximum amount of primary power may be developed at Dam No. 2 and at any and all other dams below the said Cove Creek Dam, $2,000,000 of said appropriation shall be made available with which to begin construction of said Cove Creek Dam during calendar year 1932."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the amendment is not in order, in view of the fact that it is a direct appropriation of money and the Committee on Military Affairs has no appropriating power.

Further, the matter is not within the scope of the Committee on Military Affairs, but within the scope of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, even if it were an authorization.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. May I ask the gentleman to reserve his point of order for five minutes?

Mr. STAFFORD. As the gentleman comes from the Cove Creek country, I will be very glad to reserve the point of order for five minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS] has already very ably emphasized the importance of this Cove Creek Dam construction. Every person who has made a study of the Muscle Shoals proposition has recognized that Cove Creek is not only an integral part, but an indispensable part of this system. Every commission that has been appointed to investigate this question has reported to the White House and to the Congress that Cove Creek is the heart and soul of the Muscle Shoals project.

So, recognizing this fact and recognizing that sooner or later it will be necessary to construct the Cove Creek dam,

I want to say that in view of the very acute unemployment situation in that section at this time, there is every argument for an immediate appropriation to go forward with this important work. Land values are cheaper, perhaps, in this section now than they will ever be again, and therefore the area which will be inundated can be acquired at less expense to the Government.

Cove Creek dam is situated in the heart of a large bituminous-coal field, where unemployment is most acute, and this legislation would be a godsend to that situation.

As has been referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS], the construction of this dam is very essential to the solution of navigation and flood control on the Tennessee River.

There is every argument for this construction, and we all recognize that sooner or later it must come, so why quibble about it? Why not proceed to do the job at once, particularly on account of the very distressing and very alarming labor situation in that section of the country? [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the amendment offered by my colleague is simply an authorization and is clearly not subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin desire to press his point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, when I originally made the point of order, or reserved it, I was under the impression it was a direct appropriation. My attention has since been called to the fact that it is an authorization, but I make the further point of order it is not germane. The fact is, the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR] is not contingent and is not related at all to the Muscle Shoals proposition. Section 11 is directly connected with the leasing of the Muscle Shoals property. Whether a lease is perfected or not, the gentleman's amendment provides for an authorization for the construction of this dam, a matter that comes within the purview of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and not within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Military Affairs. I respectfully contend it is not germane to the matter in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT). Jurisdiction having been assumed by the Committee on Military Affairs in the pending section, the Chair does not think the gentleman's point of order is well taken in that regard.

The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. The Committee on Military Affairs in considering this whole question naturally had to give a great deal of thought to the subject of Cove Creek Dam, and at the time we held our regular meeting on Muscle Shoals the Committee on Rivers and Harbors was having hearings in reference to the development of the dam and locks and improvements that would accrue to that particular section, and so our committee called the Chief of Engineers, who frankly admitted that they were carefully going over the whole question, and would report and recommend to Congress, in the interest of the War Department, any information on this particular subject.

Now, I submit in all fairness, under section 11, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, we are authorizing an appropriation of some $34,000,000 to complete the dam itself, and in this bill we are authorizing the right of eminent domain, so that the Government may go in and condemn the land around this dam. There would have to be an appropriation naturally to acquire that property around the dam.

Mr. LOVETTE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. I yield.

Mr. LOVETTE. The gentleman understands that the $34,000,000 includes the acquisition of property rights around the dam?

Mr. GOSS. No; I do not.

Mr. LOVETTE. It does, as the gentleman will see by the Engineers' report.

Mr. McSWAIN. The gentleman from Tennessee is right; it includes the property around the dam.

Mr. GOSS. Does it include the power project?

Mr. McSWAIN. There is no power project there.

Mr. GOSS. Does it include all the land over which the water will flow?

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. At any rate, it is a very large amount for us to be considering at the present time. I want to call to the attention of the committee that under the terms of the bill as written, the Secretary of War may make this authorization when demand for extra power is made.

I happen to know that there are only some 40,000 kilowatts at Muscle Shoals Dam No. 2 at the present time, and it has been demonstrated that it would be necessary to have additional power if and when this plant gets to operating and making fertilizer. That time may come before 1935, and it may not come until 1945, but we ought not to give authorization in this particular bill.

I know this is a delicate subject, and I am not enough partisan to oppose the matter just because it is being suggested for the great State of Tennessee. I do not think, from the study I have given, that this is a proper time to do it, nor is this the proper way to legislate. I believe that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and other committees will give mature consideration to the subject, and will be better able to judge of its merits. I hope the committee will vote down the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee at this time. [Applause.]

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I propose to vote for this bill, because it is the best we can secure. I understand that under the provisions of this measure it means an expenditure of thirty or forty million dollars, if the property is leased. I am going to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR], because I understand if it is adopted that means an expenditure of $5,000,000 additional.

I am going to vote for any measure that is brought in on this floor which will provide for the expenditure of money that will help to put some of the millions of people in this country now unemployed to work. [Applause.] I want to say that if this Congress adjourns and goes home without doing something to relieve this unemployment situation there is many a man here now who will not return as a Member of the next Congress.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. GOSS. Is the gentleman expressing his own views or the views of the Economy Committee, of which he is a member?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I am trying to bring to the attention of the House the necessity for adopting a program that will put to work people who are now unemployed.

It is proper to economize. This House had a chance to save $100,000,000 by consolidating the Army and Navy. Did you do it? No; it failed by a few votes. All that is required is a change of 13 votes, and such a bill can pass this House. Would it not be wise to take that $100,000,000 and put it in public work, where men would be given employment?

Had the President not expressed opposition to that consolidation it would have passed by 50 votes. The President's opposition defeated that section of the economy bill. It is on the way, just around the corner, and the Army and Navy can commence now to prepare for it. Other economies can be effected and will be effected.

It is not good business, however, to reduce the salaries of the employees in the low brackets, for that lowers the purchasing power, and what we need now is more consumption rather than less consumption.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman. I voted to stop cutting wages.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman voted right, then. I want to put men to work who are not receiving any wages, men who are living on charity, with their families half starved, their babies undernourished, not for a month, not for two months, but for a year or the past two or three years.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. You have a situation before you that can not be left alone. Something must be done, and the Government must lead the way. I now yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. McGUGIN. I am very much interested in what the gentleman says. What program would the gentleman suggest that the Government should embark upon that would put 8,000,000 men back to work?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I will vote now, to-morrow, or any other day—the sooner the better—for a five billion or more bond issue for a public-works program, and I will vote also to eliminate machinery wherever we can eliminate it and put men to work and give the machines a rest.

Mr. McGUGIN. Would that put 8,000,000 men to work?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes; if you make sufficient provisions. I want to put the people to work—as many as we possibly can. Such a program will start putting them to work. That is what we need—a start. If the Government will lead the way, private business will follow.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will that program put 8,000,000 men to work?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It will put a great many to work; it will stimulate business; and that will put people to work who will manufacture the articles that those engaged in public work can purchase after they have some purchasing power. You must start somewhere. Let the Government embark upon a real program and lead us out of this depression.

Oh, you say, do not increase the public debt. Better to increase it now by a few billions than by many times that amount at a later date.

Go out in the hall and read the statistics on the sign you will find there. It shows the total wealth of this country as $320,000,000,000. What is our total debt now? On May 1 of this year our total public debt, including all deficits, was less than $19,000,000,000. Still some would complain if this was increased in order to put our citizens to work. You may just as well make up your minds now that you are going to provide work for the unemployed, because if you do not do it now your successors will do it.

It is amazing that the business men of this country have not long since realized the necessity of governmental action. You quickly responded to the suggestion to set aside $2,000,000,000 to loan to big business. When that bill was pending we were told to pass it and conditions will quickly return to normal. If the business men will get behind a movement to take care of the unemployed as they did when the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill was pending it could be enacted into law in a week.

There must be and there will be some change, and it will largely depend upon the Congress whether this change will be for the better or worse. Let us hope that it will be for the better, and let us have action now.

When that great journalist, Joseph Pulitzer, publisher of the St. Louis-Post Dispatch and New York World, died he provided in his will for certain annual awards, among them one for the best example of newspaper correspondence. The trustees of the Columbia University, upon recommendation of its school of journalism, this year awarded to Mr. Charles G. Ross, of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, the $500 set aside for this purpose. This recognition resulted from an article written by Mr. Ross, who is the chief Washington correspondent of his paper. The contribution was of such importance that it was placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by the Senate and will be found on page 449 of the RECORD for the first session of the Seventy-second Congress, December 14, 1931. It was not only reprinted in this country but copies were sent abroad. The article had to do with the subject I am now discussing—the condition of the country and unemployment.

It is headed "The Country's Plight—What Can Be Done About It? Present-Day Distribution of Wealth Found To Be the Root Cause of Both Overproduction and Unemployment—An Exposition of What President Hoover Has Characterized as 'The Greatest Crisis the World Has Ever Known'—The Significant Facts Underlying the National Predicament Which Will Be Presented to the Coming Congress."

Mr. Chairman, that article was prepared upon the eve of the convening of Congress. I happened to be in Washington at the time, and I know that Mr. Ross spent many, many weeks in research work. He was contributing a statement of facts to national legislators based upon official statistics that could not be assailed; and, of course, it was his hope and the hope of the paper he represented that Members of the Congress would be aided in enacting important legislation that would at least alleviate existing conditions. Today, May 5, five months have passed, and I ask you to point to one piece of legislation that has been of benefit to the millions walking our streets looking for employment—honest citizens willing to work.

I repeat again, gentlemen, even though it be necessary to remain here until December, you dare not go home until you have found some way to help the millions in distress. Your stay will be permanent if you do not heed this warning. Democrat or Republican, you will be held to account by your constituents and rightfully so. They can not live on wind and hot air, all that has been offered to them these many months. Balancing the Budget may be important, reducing Government expenditures is necessary, but the all-important question confronting you to-day is to provide a job for every honest American that is willing to work. Never mind the cost. That will be quickly absorbed when we return to normal. It is my opinion the longer you delay the greater will be the cost. If you do not know the situation, read Mr. Ross's article. I only wish I could again reproduce it in the RECORD, at this point, but the rules will not permit.

Mr. Ross has been in Washington since 1918, as the chief of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch bureau. Another member of that bureau, Mr. Paul Y. Anderson, previously received this award.

Born in 1885 in Independence, Mo., Mr. Ross graduated from the Missouri University and in 1908 accepted a call and became a member of the faculty in the journalism school of that outstanding institution. For one year he served on a newspaper in Melbourne, Australia.

His charming wife was born in the district I represent. His two sons are attending college.

Mr. Ross was detailed by the Post-Dispatch to cover the London Naval Conference and was also sent to the Pan American Conference in Habana. He made a trip to Europe where he remained for several months, several years back, and his articles on conditions abroad attracted world-wide attention.

Three additional articles supplementary to the Country's Plight were written by Mr. Ross.

One referred to prohibition and its cost to the Nation, another was on the subject of unemployment, and the third was on the abuse of the tariff.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri) there were—ayes 15, noes 56.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 11.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Beginning on page 13, with line 10, strike out all of section 11.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the proposal is whether it is necessary as a fertilizer proposition to add to the power facilities of Muscle Shoals by building Cove Creek Dam 350 miles from the site of Muscle Shoals, almost as far as between here and Boston, lacking only 100 miles. Let me disabuse the minds of my Democratic friends of any thought that I am opposing this proposal to spend $34,000,000 to $50,000,000 from any sectional spirit against the South. I take pride when I look back on the fact that in 1922 when the preceding Congress, of which I was not a Member, had voted to discontinue all further work on Muscle Shoals Dam it was my privilege as a member of the committee of conference on the War Department appropriation bill to move to concur in the Senate amendment sponsored by the Senator from Nebraska, Mr. NORRIS, to provide $10,000,000 toward the completion of the Muscle Shoals Dam. That statement is sufficient, I think, to show that I am not unsympathetic toward the Southland.

But I believe that this is not the time for us to launch into any unnecessary expenditure of from $34,000,000 to $50,000,000, when the utilization of Muscle Shoals is not dependent upon that expenditure. Water is flowing over the dam seven months of the year to the extent of 250,000 horsepower at that place. We have in addition an auxiliary steam plant there capable of furnishing additional power during the five months of dry period which will provide a primary power at Muscle Shoals at all times of from 160,000 to 250,000 horsepower throughout the year. As a business proposition, and I view all of the proposals that come before this Congress and before the committee of which I am a member from the attitude of strict business, especially in these times, is it advisable now to spend this money to merely double the power capacity of Muscle Shoals?

The President of the United States in his veto message a year ago said that this Cove Creek Dam was only about 5 per cent a navigation and flood-control proposition. The Chief of Engineers, General Brown, when he came before our committee this year, said in opening his testimony:

> The War Department has no project that directly involves the Cove Creek proposition.

Those are his opening words. Further in his testimony, on page 345, he uses this language:

> Cove Creek is primarily a power proposition, although a release of that water in low water would be of benefit to navigation. But for navigation purposes only I do not consider it absolutely necessary to build Cove Creek.

What do you propose to do? Of course, the Representatives from the immediate vicinity of Cove Creek, the two distinguished Republicans from Tennessee, are in favor of this proposal or excuse to flood much of the land of three counties in Tennessee. Why would not these farmers in that country be willing in these times to sell their lands to the Government of the United States?

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield later if I have time. I can not yield now.

Where is there any person in this country who is not willing to sell his land and get liquid capital?

I wish to submit to the sober judgment of the House this proposal, that if we build Cove Creek Dam and increase the power at Muscle Shoals, and only increase it for power purposes, we merely provide that this existing facility at Muscle Shoals will be more favorable to the big chemical interests and not to the small chemical interests.

I take the firm position that Muscle Shoals property today is an integral part that can be leased if it is worthy to be leased, and that it can be leased to-day because there is adequate horsepower to the extent of 250,000 for seven months, and, with the aid of the subsidiary steam plant, 150,000 horsepower the year round. There are buildings, and we say to this leasing board, "Go before the country and advertise and see whether you can get a lease for these properties with that power."

Now, under the existing method, the modern method of the nine nitrogen plants that are established in this country for manufacturing synthetic nitrogen, not one of them uses power in any great amount. Not one of them uses power in connection with the manufacture of nitrogen. Power is used only in the manufacture of nitrogen by the obsolete method known as the cyanamide method, the nine private plants in this country that are to-day engaged in the manufacture of synthetic nitrogen with the modern process, by abstracting nitrogen from the air, do not use water power.

Therefore, how can anyone contend that in these times we should, as a power proposition, proceed with the expenditure of $36,000,000 as a minimum to buy land and build a dam 350 miles away, farther than between here and New York by over 120 miles, not for the purpose of navigation or flood control, because it is so minor and insignificant, but merely to increase the power facilities at Muscle Shoals?

Mr. Chairman, in these times as business executives, if we were members of a board of directors, having in our power the disposition of an integral property which is already complete, which could be utilized for a manufacturing purpose where no additional power would be required for the successful operation of the plant, we should not go off into an extraneous field and vote $36,000,000, nor $10,000,000 for that matter; but we should leave it for the future to determine when the need arises.

As I said yesterday, with all sincerity, I have been trying my best not only to balance the Budget but to vote for economic programs, and I say we can not consistently, with the record we have made, add $36,000,000, and more likely $50,000,000, by inaugurating this proposal 350 miles away, which means merely the purchasing of land in three counties, and the building of a dam for reservoir purposes.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not just now.

We have had all this power for the past 10 years. Magnify the evil. We have had a white elephant on our hands, and now the proposal is to magnify the white elephant, blow it up still larger, twofold, and by blowing it up and enlarging it twofold, you therefore think you will have a better economical proposition to dispose of as a business proposition. That might be good Farmer-Labor policy, but it is not good, sound Republican doctrine, and I do not think it is good, sound Democratic doctrine, though it is reported in this bill.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. Does the gentleman make the representation that this bill provides for the expenditure of from $36,000,000 to $60,000,000 now?

Mr. STAFFORD. If the lease is consummated, it is obligatory. If no lease is consummated, it is left to a favorable board to take the position that the Government must spend that money without any further approval by the President or anybody else.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin said that the policy of building Cove Creek Dam is not in line with good Republican doctrine. The provision in the bill for the construction of this dam carries out the recommendation of the present head of the Republican Party, who is not only the President of the United States but also a great engineer and a great authority on the subject of rivers and river development.

In Mr. Hoover's veto message to the Congress on the Muscle Shoals bill passed during the last Congress, under date of March 3, 1931, he made this statement:

> The Federal Government should, as in the case of Boulder Canyon, construct Cove Creek Dam as a regulatory measure for the flood protection of the Tennessee Valley and the development of its water resources, but on the same bases as those imposed at Boulder Canyon—that is, that construction should be undertaken at such time as the proposed commission is able to secure contracts for use of the increased water supply to power users or the lease of the power produced as a by-product from such a dam on terms that will return to the Government interest upon its outlay with amortization.

Having before us this recommendation of the President of the United States, the subcommittee in drafting the pending bill drafted the bill so as to carry out the recommendation.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SNELL. I do not understand that the bill carries out the recommendation provided in that veto message.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Certainly it does. I will explain it to the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. I would like to have the gentleman explain it if he can, so that I can undertsand it.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The bill provides that the dam shall not be constructed unless a lessee is secured, or if no lessee is secured, unless the board certify that the additional power which would be derived from the construction of the Cove Creek Dam is needed for the manufacture of fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients.

Mr. SNELL. But that does not say that the revenue from it shall pay for the construction of the dam the same as it does in Boulder Canyon.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Exactly. When this House passed the Boulder Canyon bill it could not know, as a mathematical certainty, that the Government was going to get back every dollar.

Mr. SNELL. It was as near a mathematical certainty as we could make it, and it was based upon contracts for the power that eventually would pay for the dam.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Exactly; and this bill is based on the same proposition.

Mr. SNELL. There is not a word in the contract the gentleman speaks of that says that. Show it to me.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Let me say to the distinguished gentleman from New York that the terms of any lease covering this property will provide for payment for the power from this Cove Creek Dam that the lessee uses, and the rate for the power will be such as to pay the Government a reasonable return on the money invested in the dam, as well as an amount sufficient to amortize the cost of the dam over a period of years.

Mr. SNELL. I hate to disagree with the gentleman, but the gentleman can not read that in the language of this bill. That language is not there.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Of course, the bill does not prescribe all the details of a lease, but it lays down for the board certain principles which bind the board.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for one further question?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes; for a brief question.

Mr. SNELL. In the construction of the Boulder Canyon Dam we definitely laid out the whole program, and what we were going to get for the money. The Secretary of the Interior was not authorized to go ahead until he had definite contracts signed so that the money coming in would pay for the dam. That is not true of the bill now under consideration.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. We are not going ahead with the Cove Creek Dam either until a lease is made; or until Government operation, if we should have Government operation, is so successful that it will pay the Government to construct the dam.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes; just for a question.

Mr. MICHENER. If the gentleman knows, will the gentleman inform us what is the stand-by expense of this project at this time? What does it cost us in a stand-by condition?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The maintenance of the nitrate plants costs $82,000 annually. I can not give the gentleman off-hand just what the hydroelectric facilities cost, because we are selling some of that power there to-day.

Mr. MICHENER. What is the income?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I think I can explain it.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes; I yield. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] is a member of the Subcommittee on Appropriations, which has before it all these figures.

Mr. TABER. Not at the present time. Two hundred and sixty-five thousand dollars is the total expense for the whole Muscle Shoals project and for 1930 the revenues were $597,000. For the year 1931 down to about the 1st of October the revenues were approximately $550,000.

Mr. MICHENER. In other words, if we let this plant stand as it is, it would pay us a profit of about $250,000 a year.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. And if you let it stand idle as it is to-day, you will have about two and one-half million dollars of water going to waste over the dam every year. That is what is happening to-day.

Mr. MICHENER. If that be true, if that water were put to use making fertilizer, it would continue to keep out of business fertilizer plants which are to-day out of business.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No; it would not do that at all. It would free the farmers of this country from their dependence for nitrogen upon Chile and Germany and other foreign countries.

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, with reference to the return to the Federal Treasury of any money invested in the Cove Creek Dam, let me say that the report of the Engineers shows that there are some 12 or 14 dam sites on the Tennessee River below the Cove Creek Dam where dams undoubtedly at some time will be built. The Cove Creek Dam will not only double the primary power at the Government dam, the Wilson Dam, but will also double the primary power at all of these other 12 or 14 dams, and under the Federal water power act the owners of these other 12 or 14 dams must pay the Government of the United States for the benefits derived from the construction of the Cove Creek Dam.

Cove Creek Dam is a wonderful project. It will create a reservoir 83 square miles in area. There will be enough water in the reservoir that if the District of Columbia were level and a wall were built around it, and the water within the reservoir were poured into the District of Columbia, we would be working 75 feet under the surface of the water.

General Brown, Chief of Engineers, testifying before the Senate Committee on Agriculture, stated that the average yearly damage to property due to floods on the Tennessee River amounts to $1,780,000 and that if Cove Creek Dam were constructed the flood damage would be eliminated. So, in the saving of property, in the prevention of destruction from floods, this dam would pay for itself in less than 20 years time. It would give protection to the great city of Chattanooga, to cities like Johnsonville, Florence, and Rockwood, protecting them from the ravages of the waters of the Tennessee, and it would even give protection from floods on the Mississippi River.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 70, noes 102.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. All disputes shall be subject to arbitration.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. For some 10 or 12 years this Muscle Shoals problem has been before the Congress and the country. On the one hand there has been the fertilizer combination fighting for its selfish advantages and trying to get the most out of this project for itself. On the other hand the power corporations of the South have been fighting to get the project disposed of to their advantage, with the result the efforts of Congress to legislate in the interest of the people have been blocked until the country believes that Congress is unable to function at all on this important matter. I say the time has come when the Congress ought to act and dispose of this long-pending issue and get this great natural resource to work in the interest of the people. [Applause.]

I am not authority enough upon the fertilizer proposition to know whether or not it is true, as contended, that this project can be made to furnish the American farmers cheaper fertilizer. However, one of two things is true. Either it will produce fertilizer economically or it will not. If it can produce cheap fertilizer, then it is something worth while and very much in the interest of the farmers of this country. If that can not be done, then, of course, the power which would otherwise be consumed in the manufacture of fertilizer will become surplus power and can be disposed of under the provisions of this bill, preference being given to the States, cities, and counties in contracting for that power.

I want to say that this project, which has been referred to as a white elephant, is one of the most valuable assets which the people of America possess to-day. I hope the title to this great asset will never pass out of the hands of the Government.

If a lease can not be made for the manufacture of fertilizer, then this great project ought to be put at work and the power made available to the public corporations as set forth in this bill.

Personally I would like to see this bill go much farther than it does in the way of the disposal of the power in the interest of the people. I think the power question is one of the great questions before the country to-day. I think that next to light, air, and water, electricity has become one of the necessities of life. When the American people own a great project, into which they have already put $140,000,000, they ought not to stop in the middle of the stream but ought to go through and put the great natural resources of the Tennessee River to work.

We are on the threshold of a great electrical era. No one knows to-day what the future of electricity will be. We only know that every day new uses are being found for it. We are counting on it to take the drudgery out of our everyday life. Inventions and improvements of process make it possible to send electricity a thousand miles. Wide areas can be benefited by the development of the Tennessee River. So it is that Muscle Shoals is a great national asset of the American people. Let us go forward with its development and put it to work as soon as possible and that would be, truly, in the interest of national economy. If it will produce cheap nitrates that is in the interest of the farmer and will be a most valuable asset in reserve for national defense in time of war. We can find out only by trying it. If we find that can not be done, then there is the power which can be put to use in the interest of all the region in the Southeast. It is impossible to have too much electrical energy.

I sincerely trust we will pass this bill, send it to the Senate, and after they have acted upon it and it comes back from conference I hope it will be even a better bill than it is to-day. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. In the event the board is unable, within not to exceed 18 months from the date of the approval of this act to effect a lease under the provisions of this act, or a contract of lease entered into is defaulted, and no new lease is entered into within a period of six months thereafter, it shall be the duty of the board to operate the nitrate plants or either of them by employment of existing facilities or by modernizing the existing plants and facilities for the production of nitrogenous plant food of a kind and quality and in form available as plant food and capable of being applied directly to the soil in connection with the growth of crops containing not less than 10,000 tons of fixed nitrogen, and said amount of such fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients shall periodically be increased from time to time as the market demands may reasonably require until the maximum production capacity of the plants now owned by the Government at Muscle Shoals, as the board may find them to be economically adapted, or susceptible of being made economically adapted for the fixation of nitrogen is reached, if the reasonable demands of the market shall justify except when the market demands are satisfied by maintenance in storage and unsold of such fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients containing at least 2,500 tons of fixed nitrogen. Whenever such stock in storage shall fall below the quantity containing 2,500 tons of fixed nitrogen the production of such nitrogenous plant food shall thereupon be resumed: Provided, That the board in the event it undertakes to manufacture fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients is hereby authorized to modify, change, and improve such plants and construct other plants in its judgment necessary for the purpose of producing fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients.

The board shall have the power and authority at all times to negotiate and conclude a lease and is directed to conclude a lease, if it can be effected, pursuant to the provisions of this act: Provided, That any lease effected hereunder shall not be for a term which would extend beyond 50 years from the date of the enactment of this act. In the event any responsible offer is received that conforms to, and a contract of lease is entered into under the leasing provisions of this act, then the production of fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients by the board as in this section provided shall be terminated, and possession shall be transferred to the lessee with the least possible interruption to the production of fertilizer and/or fertilizer ingredients.

Surplus power in excess of that required from time to time by the board for the production of fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients, subject to a lease as herein provided, shall be sold or disposed of by the board at the switchboard on an equitable basis, giving States, counties, and municipalities the preference, subject to recall after reasonable notice, not to exceed 18 months, for use by a lessee under any subsequent lease as in this act provided.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CHIPERFIELD: Page 16, line 5, strike out all of section 14.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent at this time to proceed in the discussion of this amendment for 15 minutes.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I have an amendment I desire to offer, which may be in the nature of a perfecting amendment, and the gentleman, perhaps, would be willing to accept it.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I am not at all particular as to the order in which my amendment shall be considered. If it is the judgment of the Chamber that it would be better to determine upon the other amendments first, I do not wish to crowd my amendment at the present time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman propose to offer a perfecting amendment?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Georgia has a perfecting amendment; yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That ought to be offered before the motion to strike.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to insist upon any particular order. If it is the judgment of the Chair and the committee that we should hear the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia, I am willing to reserve my motion to strike.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of procedure, if the perfecting amendment is not offered until after the pending motion, if the gentleman's motion should prevail, the gentleman from Georgia could not offer a perfecting amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The perfecting amendment would be voted on first.

Mr. TILSON. And the motion of the gentleman from Illinois would be pending, awaiting decision on the other amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my amendment be read before we consider the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I have no objection to that.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PARKER of Georgia: Page 16, line 10, after the word "to," strike out the remainder of the section and insert in lieu thereof the following: "report the facts to Congress and ask for further instruction."

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, this motion to strike out section 14 brings us squarely to the question whether or not a majority of this committee will insist upon retaining in this bill this section, which according to my idea, means inevitably Government operation of this plant at Muscle Shoals.

I am aware, and I want to state the matter fairly, that there is a very sharp and divergent view as to the meaning of this bill in connection with section 14. The proponents of this measure have stated upon the floor very vigorously that it will be easily possible to obtain a private lease for the operation of this plant, and they have not hesitated to state very vigorously their full belief that this can and will be done within the period provided for the making of such a lease; that is, within a period of 18 months.

I submit in all fairness for the consideration of those who take this view that if it is correct, it seems to me you are standing in your own light.

If the gentlemen really have faith when they say that a private lease for Muscle Shoals can be obtained, when they resist a motion to strike out section 14, then they are doing everything in their power to defeat the purpose which they are seeking to accomplish by this bill.

Let me make myself perfectly plain to those who are the proponents of this measure and let me appeal to their reason and their sense of fairness in this connection.

I take it, and it could not be otherwise, that there is a genuine, a sincere, and a deep-seated desire for the purposes that have been expressed by the speakers on this floor in behalf of this measure, that it may be put into operation at the speediest possible moment. I can well understand that hope on the part of those whose sections of the country are to be affected and whose acres will, it is said, be benefited if the plant at Muscle Shoals shall be operated according to the plans that have been discussed by the proponents of this measure; but here is a practical proposition that now presents itself.

You have 18 months under this bill to see whether or not an effective and a desirable lease can be obtained. As I have before stated, you have expressed the belief that such a lease can be surely obtained; and if it can, then it puts into operation all the beneficial effects which have been suggested in the discussion here, and it gives to this section the relief that they desire and the benefit that they hope will accrue.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. May I ask the gentleman if he believes there will be any limit on the period of time that the board can have to lease this property if the entire section is stricken?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. No; I do not think so, as I recall the language of the bill.

Let me continue with this thought, and I will come back to that. If you do get a lease within 18 months, this act, in my opinion, with section 14 stricken out, can be passed by this House to-day.

I have no right to say what will be done with this measure by the President, and I would not assume for a minute that it is within my power or within my privilege to speak for him; but gentleman on this floor well know and understand that the same things that have impelled the veto on the part of the President in the past would certainly—so it seems to me—impel him to veto this proposition if it is passed at this time in its present condition.

I want to appeal again to the reason of this House. What have you to gain, gentlemen, from any standpoint, by insisting upon keeping in this provision for Government operation if you know that within a brief time it means a veto of your entire proposition by the President?

Mr. SWING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. For a remark or a question?

Mr. SWING. For a question. Has the gentleman considered the value of this section in the hands of the board in order to negotiate a lease?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Yes. We discussed that briefly yesterday.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman knows that the property had no value, so power and fertilizer companies insisted, until Henry Ford made an offer therefor.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I have great regard for the gentleman's opinion and judgment; but I want to ask this question, and I am not going to give the gentleman time to answer in my time. [Laughter.] What have you to gain if in a brief time you have destroyed by a presidential veto all chance of obtaining the thing you say you so much desire?

I do not pretend to stand here as an instructor to any other man in this House—I have difficulty enough in trying to determine my own course of action without acting as advisor to other Members on either side of this Chamber. But it means—and I quote this without reflection—that the wayfaring man, though a fool, can not be mistaken in the conclusion I am advancing. For the purpose of insisting on a theory—and it will only be a theory—you are forcing a situation where you will lose that which you now stand a chance to attain.

Now, let me ask you this question—I have asked you what you will gain if you persist in that course—what will you lose if you strike out section 14?

The gentleman from California suggests that it constitutes a threat. I want to say that you will never get a lessee in the world to go in and spend the millions of dollars that it is necessary to spend merely because of the fear that somebody else will some time operate the plant. If any other gentleman has a different view, his opinion is entitled to much weight, but that is the way it appears to me.

Now, going back a moment, what will you lose if you strike out section 14? Unless I am mistaken, you will lose nothing.

Another Congress will be in session before the 18 months have expired, and the same threat which you seek to incorporate in this bill will be as available at that time as it is now.

According to this bill we are going to lease it, and if you do not secure a lease now that will satisfactorily dispose of this property, then you can go to the next Congress for the purpose of further legislation that will put the Government into business, if that then be deemed the policy of the House of Representatives.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. I believe the gentleman is striking out the provision for the 18 months when he strikes out the entire section.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. That probably should be considered in connection with all of the other argument that is advanced, and it may be considered in connection with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia; but either I am in the deepest kind of error, or else my statement is sound, and it is apparent to me that you are defeating, by retaining section 14, your very purpose.

In other words, you are getting the shadow and losing the substance by insisting on this action. There are many men on our side of the House who can go along with this program, provided you take out the thing that we are unalterably opposed to, and that is Government operation. I lay down this proposition that at this time when the Nation is in a period of dire distress and depression, it is not the time to put the Government into business to further compete with those who are struggling along in the dark, hoping they may last through the days of adversity.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I am with the gentleman as against Government ownership and operation of business in private industry ordinarily, but there are times and circumstances when the Government must operate. For instance, take the United States mails, and all of our work on the Mississippi River. The gentleman is surely in favor of that.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I can not yield for comment. I shall be glad to answer what the gentleman has suggested. Yes; there are certain governmental functions that must be carried on by governmental methods and agencies. I could well understand how the Government could with propriety sell the water power at Muscle Shoals as it stands, and there was an offer made previously of two and a half million dollars per annum for this power, but we might just as well face the situation. As a certain great democratic statesman said, it is a condition and not a theory that confronts us.

I am standing here to-day in a very humble capacity, and certainly not as a dictator to any man in the House, but I say that if you force this situation as you propose to do, when you are done you will have just exactly what you have now, and that is nothing at all.

As for the principle of Government operation, there are many men on both sides of the Chamber who are fundamentally opposed to it, but there are yet more men who have grave doubts as to the propriety of entering upon it at this time, when they consider and realize that the mere rehabilitation of the plant and putting it into condition to manufacture fertilizer as the first cost alone, the cost would amount to $50,000,000 of the people's money, and that that would be merely the opening wedge to the door of the Treasury for raids—and I do not say that offensively—that would come year after year and would deplete the receipts of the country at a time when it can so ill afford it.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. Did the gentleman's estimate of $50,000,000 as an initial expenditure include that for Cove Creek?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Oh, no. For Cove Creek they estimate $34,000,000, but the purchase of the land and the acquisition of the rights and the building of the dam, which of itself would cost $36,000,000, without any question would equal $50,000,000, and there can be little doubt about that.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. The gentleman recognizes, of course, that it would take a long period of time to spend this $34,000,000.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I do, and the gentleman's point is well taken, but I suggest to the gentleman that the people of the United States are not in a temper or frame of mind where they will accept with any degree of complacency the making of great appropriations or, if you like, authorizations at this time that must precede Government operation of this utility. It is my opinion, as expressed yesterday, that at the present time this plant is not available for use; that it would require these great expenditures. It is a fact well established that the private fertilizer plants, numbering some 800, in the United States have a capacity three times in excess of the fertilizer requirements of the Nation. And so in consideration of all these things, by every theory and principle of logic, it seems to me that section 14 should be eliminated from the bill. Then you would have a workable bill, a bill that probably would be approved by the President of the United States. The situation resolves itself into this. Take your choice. Either adopt a policy that is so dear to you, or stand stubbornly—and I do not give reasonable probability of a realization of the thing that is so dear to you or stand stubbornly—and I do not say that offensively—that you will take this bill as it is without the elimination of section 14 and presently lose the approval of this measure and have nothing of what you have attempted to get by this legislation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I shall consume only five minutes. This particular combination of the leasing provision first, followed by the Government operation afterward, is not a mere theory. It is the development of years of experience. For many years we had worked to get a lease through legislatively to Henry Ford and had failed. We then worked for years to get a lease through to the American Cyanamid Co. and failed. Then the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Morin, at that time chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, introduced a bill which was passed by this House, which was Government operation pure and simple, with no leasing provision in it whatsoever. That bill passed the Senate in the latter days of the Sixty-ninth Congress. Before the expiration of the 10-day period authorized by the Constitution, the Congress had adjourned, and the bill suffered what is known as the pocket veto at the hands of President Coolidge.

Then the distinguished gentleman from Texas, who now occupies the chair presiding over this Committee of the Whole, and myself, having sat side by side for years in these efforts, conceived the idea that we would offer a bill not to lease to a particular individual or particular corporation but a general authorizaton, with power in the hands of the President or the President's board, to negotiate a lease, not with Henry Ford specifically, not with the American Cyanamid Co. specifically, but with anybody that came up. Then we conceived the thought we would tie to that leasing provision the principle of the Morin bill, so that if nobody in the United States came forward and negotiated a lease with the President that then this great property might be put into operation.

Subsequent to the retirement of the distinguished gentleman from Texas from the committee, I conceived—and I am happy that it is in this bill—the idea that even though Government operation should be inaugurated, the power to lease should continue even after that indefinitely through the whole period of 50 years.

When the subcommittee reported this bill, I expressed it to the newspaper reporters that this bill was a nice thick slice of private operation in front, a little thin slice of Government operation in the middle, followed by a nice thick slice of private operation afterwards. [Applause.]

Now, is Government operation under these circumstances and in this property so very despicable? Let me call your attention to the fact that President Coolidge appointed a commission in 1925, which studied this entire project for a year, expended many thousands of dollars in accumulating evidence, and reported in 1926.

That commission was headed by Hon. John C. McKenzie, of Illinois, who had been chairman of this very Committee on Military Affairs; and former Senator Dial, of South Carolina, who, as you know, is not a radical gentleman, was a member, and Mr. Bower, of the Farm Bureau Federation, was a member of that commission. They said in substance that if a lease could not be obtained under satisfactory terms and conditions to effectuate the original purpose of this particular property they would reluctantly be compelled to turn to Government operation in order to accomplish the great purpose for which this great project was inaugurated. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on my amendment.

If the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois should prevail, the effect of this act would be to create a Muscle Shoals board for an indefinite period of time. The only function of that board would be to negotiate a lease of the Muscle Shoals properties. If the board should never be able to secure a lease, it would still exist and would have no other functions.

If my amendment is adopted, the board would have 18 months within which to secure a lease; or if it should secure a lease, and the lessee should default for a period of six months, then the board would be required to report those facts to Congress and ask for further instructions.

Either of the amendments will eliminate Government operation from the bill and will be perfectly satisfactory to me; but I do not believe we should strike the whole section, because, as I have said before, by that action we would create a board for an indefinite period of time; and if it did not secure a lease, there would be nothing for the board to do.

Mr. ALMON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. ALMON. Does not the bill as now written provide that if we have Government operation it will be operated by the board for the Government?

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Yes, sir; but if section 14 is stricken, Government operation will not be in the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the perfecting amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McGUGIN as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. PARKER of Georgia: Page 16, line 10, after the word "to," in line 10, and beginning with the word "operate," strike all the remainder of section 14, down to and including line 11, on page 17, and insert the following: "report to the President the reasons therefor, together with its recommendations for such amendments of this act which, if approved by the Congress, in the judgment of the board, would enable it to lease the plants for the production of fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients as herein provided, and to include in such report an estimate of the amount of money that would be required for the board to engage in the manufacture of nitrogenous plant food to the extent herein required of the lessee, and also to include in such report an estimate of the cost to modify, change, or improve the existing plants or to construct other plants which in the judgment of the board would be necessary therefor. The report by the board shall be transmitted by the President to the Congress along with such recommendation as he shall deem proper."

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the question of germaneness.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose which I am striving to reach is similar to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARKER], except as I understood the gentleman's perfecting amendment was for the board to report back to the Congress. My amendment provides that the board shall make its recommendations to the President, and the President in turn shall make his recommendations to the Congress.

This amendment only goes into effect in the event the board has been unable to make a lease of this property. The board then being unable to make a lease within the 18-month period, this amendment specifically provides that the board shall report to the President, making whatever suggestion it thinks may be necessary as a modification of the lease provision in order to obtain a lease. Then, if Congress will approve of those modifications, the Government makes a lease. If it makes no such report, and reports back inability to make a private lease, and that there must be Government operation, then the board reports to the President what will be the probable cost of this adventure, which will give the Congress a fair chance to say whether or not the governmental adventure into this private enterprise is worth the money.

Now, I say most seriously to the friends of this bill, because I am far more of a friend to this bill than I am an enemy, I want to see some disposition made of Muscle Shoals. I hope it can be leased. If as a last resort it can not be leased and if Government operation is the only escape, all right; but before I would place my stamp of approval on it or before any Congressman should place his stamp of approval on it and before my country embarks upon an enterprise of this nature, I want some Congress to know what it is going to cost. [Applause.]

They say the Government is incompetent to engage in business. Is it any wonder that is true when Members of Congress will sit here and seriously consider the proposition of writing into statutory law a provision that some future Congress will be obligated to bear the expenses of an adventure, the cost of which no man on this floor knows? A child would exercise better business judgment than that.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. All of the information the gentleman seems to think is so important would be required before any appropriations were made.

Mr. McGUGIN. Oh, yes. But does the gentleman have any doubt as to the outcome when the obligation is placed upon this board to engage in this business, and when section 15 provides that all appropriations necessary to carry out the provisions of this act are authorized?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. This is only an authorization.

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. There are no appropriations.

Mr. McGUGIN. If that board went ahead and incurred any obligation or expense, is there any doubt in the mind of the gentleman from Alabama that some future Congress would not be obliged to meet that by appropriation?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The board is not authorized to incur any obligations except after appropriations are made therefor.

Mr. McGUGIN. All appropriations necessary to carry out the provisions of the act are authorized in section 15, while section 14 calls upon the board to engage in this business if it does not make a lease within 18 months.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill provides, on page 16, line 10, that if no lease can be negotiated it shall be the duty of the board to operate the nitrate plants.

Mr. McGUGIN. Why, certainly! What kind of child's play is it for this Congress to write in one section of this bill that it is a binding duty of the board to engage in this adventure, in the next section say that whatever appropriations necessary are authorized, and now try to excuse it by hoping that some future Congress might renege on appropriations.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Does not the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] know that the language of the bill does not authorize the board to incur any obligations until appropriations are made therefor?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUGIN. What was the question of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I simply stated that I felt sure the gentleman from Wisconsin knew that under the general law no board, even with the authority which the bill by its terms confers, has any legal right to incur a contractual obligation that will be binding on the Government until appropriations are made therefor.

Mr. McGUGIN. It seems perfectly obvious to me that as a business proposition Congress, which is the board of directors of the Government of the United States, should not authorize this special board to go out and incur an indefinite expense but should require that it come back to Congress with its recommendations as to what should be done in the matter. That is what I am asking for. I am seeking to carry this out in a way which is absolutely fair. If it is not done I have no doubt, in my own judgment, but that there will be no Muscle Shoals legislation in this session of Congress. I am asking a fair proposition of my friends on the Democratic side. If you want Muscle Shoals legislation enacted, why not make some fair and reasonable concessions and accept a bill which can be enacted into law?

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. Is not the only justification of section 14 of the bill the fact that it does not carry appropriations?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. SNOW. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN] and in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD]. After listening intently to this debate there is some question in my mind as to just what the purposes of this bill are. According to the language of the rule itself, its purpose is to advance the interest of national defense and agriculture; according to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS] it is a navigation and flood-control bill, while according to our good friend the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD] the passage of the bill will make it possible for the farmers of the South to obtain fertilizer at prices lower than they are now paying.

While confused as to its purposes, I am not uncertain as to the results, if this bill is enacted into law. It will simply further burden the suffering taxpayers of this country. [Applause.]

Like many Members of this House, I am unalterably opposed to the Government operating any business in competition with private industries and business. If the United States is going into the business of manufacturing fertilizer, it might as well at the same time go into the contracting business, the automobile business, the clothing business, the grocery business, the newspaper business, or any business you might pick out and thus compete with private citizens and industries of the country. Government operation to date has been a flat failure. You can not point out where the Government has ever been able to operate any business at a profit or to even break even. It always loses, and the taxpayer has to make up the deficit.

My friend from California [Mr. SWING] has objected to Members here in the House calling Muscle Shoals a white elephant. I do not wish to offend the gentleman from California and consequently will only call it a big, juicy lemon—it always has been and always will be.

In my opinion, one of three things should be done with Muscle Shoals: Lease it, and if that is impossible—and it would seem to be when you consider financial conditions at this time—give it outright to the States of Alabama and Tennessee if they will take it, and I doubt if they would accept it as a gift [applause], or let it be held by the United States for possible future war uses.

We are in a financial depression and our taxpayers are overburdened. According to the figures presented here, if this bill passes it will cause an outlay of $60,000,000. Where will that come from at this time? I do not know. When talk is made about fertilizer, let me say to you gentlemen, that if there is any Member here of the 435 Members who is interested in fertilizer, I am, coming from the district I do, where 200,000 tons are used every year. In my opinion, gentlemen, if this bill passes, it will not make it possible for the southern farmer, the northern farmer, the western farmer, or any farmer anywhere to obtain his fertilizer 1 cent cheaper. The only effect it would have upon the farmer would be to indirectly raise his taxes, and they are high enough now. Such arguments are pure bunk and bosh and I take absolutely no stock in them.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, eliminating section 14 and thus converting the bill into a leasing proposition only, should be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I think some Cicero might well arise in the country and ask: "How long, O Congress, will you abuse our patience?" As Cicero of old exclaimed in the Roman Senate: "How long, O Catiline, will you abuse our patience?"

Here the other day we emasculated and destroyed an economy bill. We then passed a new pension bill. Over in the other end of the Capitol the Senators are wrangling over a tax bill, which eventually must be passed in some form and add new burdens to the taxpayers of the country, and here we are in the House considering a bill which has for its deliberate purpose the addition of enormous expenditures on the part of the Federal Government. It is not a bill which provides for the ordinary purposes of the Federal Government as defined by the Constitution but a bill which proposes to put the Federal Government into industrial production, a bill which proposes to take the taxes of the people for the purposes of establishing an industry to be operated and controlled by the Federal administration.

My colleagues in this House, how long do you think the people of the United States will tolerate such legislation in these times, when all the people of the country are looking toward this body and toward this Congress not only for a reduction in expenditures but even for relief from a part of the taxation which is now being laid?

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. KELLER. I would like the gentleman to tell us what made these difficulties we are in at the present time?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Well, I would like to take the time to answer that question. Of course, the gentleman never heard anything about war debts; the gentleman never heard anything about the World War; the gentleman never heard anything about world-wide depression, and, more than that, the gentleman, of course, has not heard anything about foreign loans. I observed downstairs just within the moment one of the headlines in a daily paper to the effect that Great Britain is to ask us for a reduction of 25 per cent in the reduced settlement which we have already made in the payment of her war debts. Muscle Shoals itself is a remnant of the World War; it is one of the burdens we inherited from the World War; and now, in trying to remedy a situation which is bad enough as it is, we are embarking upon a plan of creating new expenditures at a time when the people are demanding that we shall cut expenditures, that we shall reduce salaries, that we shall do everything possible to economize, that we shall take the Government out of business and give private business a chance to revive and prosper. At this very moment we are proposing by section 14 in this bill to put the Government into business; we are planning to take millions of dollars out of the Treasury of the United States to put the Government into a position where it will eventually be expending hundreds of millions of dollars for the very purpose of putting the Government into private business. [Applause.]

Colleagues, this debate will reverberate throughout this land. If you are interested in Muscle Shoals, if you want to preserve it for your locality down in Alabama and Tennessee, my advice would be not to tempt further the patient and long-suffering people of the United States by proposing at this time to put the Government into the business of manufacturing fertilizer, or any product which should be left to private industry. Let us go along as best we can during this distressing period and maintain this property in statu quo. Lease it, if possible, but above all let us defeat this proposal of putting the Government into private business. [Applause.]

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, there have been about 35 minutes of debate on behalf of the general proposition to strike out and only about 5 minutes of debate in opposition. It is my desire to bring this matter to a conclusion as soon as possible, and it is our intention to have only 10 or 12 minutes more of debate on this side. I do not think there is any serious opposition to closing debate shortly, and I, therefore, feel it my duty to move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I feel my colleagues on this committee, and particularly on the Republican side of the House, as well as on the Democratic side, are entitled to know why I have finally decided to accept the Government-operation proposal as an alternative.

I am still agreeing with all the gentlemen on both sides have said about none of us wanting the Government to intermeddle in business, but I have now decided that it is better for a man who takes poison to take a small dose with an antidote than it is to take a full dose; and here we are with the Muscle Shoals plants, with an investment of $150,000,000, and we have not only this proposal here that starts out by providing for private operation, with Government operation as the alternative, but we have pending over on the other side of this Capitol a measure that starts out with Government operation and with private leasing as the alternative. So I have decided that instead of taking 10 grains of strychnine that I will take 1 grain.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Either one will kill you.

Mr. MAY. It may be sufficient to kill me, but inasmuch as it bears a Democratic label I think the strychnine will be all right.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Why take any poison at all?

Mr. MAY. Just because one of the greatest Republicans in the United States has pending in the Senate a measure full of poison that has already been favorably reported and will possibly pass the Senate and come to the House with Senate approval, and you will not be able to resist it here; we will have to take it, and it will kill us all.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The House can hold up its own end.

Mr. MAY. That may be true; but I say that we ought to spend a few more dollars in trying to save an already invested capital of $150,000,000 instead of discarding it as a piece of junk.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. MAY. I can not yield just now.

I want to call attention to Senate Joint Resolution 15, which provides for the creation of a corporation to operate Muscle Shoals, known as the Norris bill. After defining the powers and duties of the corporation, it begins its first direction in these words:

SEC. 5. The board is hereby authorized and directed—to operate existing plants for experimental purposes, to construct, maintain, and operate experimental plants at Muscle Shoals for the manufacture of fertilizer or any of the ingredients comprising fertilizer, for experimental purposes.

Not only authorized, but directed, to do what?—

It does not stop there, but it goes to the extent of demanding the construction of miles and hundreds of miles of transmission lines, which the proof shows in the record will cost $25,000 a mile.

In addition, this House bill provides that the cost of the transmission lines shall be cut off at the switchboard and the surplus product sold there.

As between the two measures, I accept the Hill bill.

Mr. McMILLAN. Who is to pay for the construction of these transmission lines to the switchboard?

Mr. MAY. There will not be any under the Hill bill, but under the Senate resolution there will be miles and hundreds of miles of them, and they will strike communities and cities and towns with perpetual franchises owned by private industry where they could not break in for a hundred years. A still, small voice says, "As between two evils choose ye the least," and that is what I am doing.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, I doubt if I am able to contribute anything to the older Members of the House who have been listening to this debate for the past 10 years. There are, however, a good many new Members, who probably knew no more about Muscle Shoals than I did when I came here in December, and I speak for their information if I have anything that will help them in the solution of this problem.

Let us consider this question of Government operation. We have Government operation now. We are operating the power plant at the present time. We have been doing so since it was constructed, and we propose to operate the power plant in the future. Under section 134 of the national defense act passed in 1916, the President was authorized to—

Construct, maintain, and operate dams, locks, and power houses for the generation of electrical power, for the production of nitrate for munitions of war and useful in the manufacture of fertilizer and other useful purposes.

There was another clause in the act, put in at the insistence of the former Senator from Iowa, Judge Kenyon, who said he would not vote for the bill unless it contained that clause which provided that the plant—

Shall be constructed and operated solely by the Government and not in conjunction with any other industry or enterprise carried on by private capital.

There is already in the law a provision that the plant shall be absolutely operated by the Government, not contingently, if no lease can be procured. So we are actually receding from the position taken in 1916.

Then we have the President's address, when he was a candidate for the Presidency, at Elizabethton, Tenn., where he said:

There are local instances where the Government must enter the business field as a by-product to some great major purpose, such as improvement of navigation, flood control, irrigation, scientific research, or national defense.

When he was asked that night by a newspaper reporter if he referred to Muscle Shoals, he said, "You may say that that means Muscle Shoals."

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETTENGILL. I yield.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I think the House would be interested to hear what the gentleman from New York said on this subject on January 20, 1927. He said:

I am very much interested in the matter of Muscle Shoals. I think the people of the country have a right to criticize us for delay in handling this great natural resource. We have it, and I feel it is up to us to put it to work. I think we have waited long enough for the fertilizer manufacturers and power companies to prepare their bids and make an adequate offer for that property. Nobody is more interested in private ownership than I, and no one is more opposed to Government ownership and operation, but I say that unless a reasonable offer is made within a reasonable time—not a long time; I mean right away quick—I am in favor of a proposition to put our Department of Chemistry down there at Muscle Shoals and put it to work.

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. PETTENGILL. The gentleman can reply in his own time. My time is very limited.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana may have one minute more in order to yield to the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. I want to say that I stand for that to-day, but my resolution did not call for the expenditure of a dollar of Federal money. It simply provided that the Department of Agriculture could go down there and make experiments in the manufacture of fertilizer and sell power enough to pay for the work. I would stand for that to-day, but I do not stand for expending $70,000,000 to $100,000,000 to put in that sinkhole, and specially under the economic condition prevailing at the present time.

Mr. PETTENGILL. In the President's veto message he said that "This great asset can be turned to practical use for the people of Tennessee and Alabama," and suggested another commission for the purpose of entering into a lease in the interests of the local community and agriculture generally. I gather from this that the President would not be opposed to government operation by the governments of Alabama and Tennessee, but he now takes the position in apparent abandonment of his Elizabethton speech that the Federal Government should not under any circumstances operate what the Federal Government already owns.

In addition we have the report of November, 1925, of the commission appointed by President Coolidge to investigate the Muscle Shoals project and to report the most practical method of utilizing to the best advantage the facilities of the plant. This commission was headed by a distinguished Republican, Hon. John C. McKenzie, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. That commission after painstaking investigation recommended among other things:

We therefore unhesitatingly recommend legislation be enacted by Congress to lease this property on such terms as have been herein enumerated, and in event of failure to obtain a lease the President should have authority to cause these plants to be immediately operated as a Government enterprise.

It is with great reluctance that we turn toward Government operation, being well advised of all of the infirmities inherent in such an undertaking. The great investment of the Government of Muscle Shoals, however; the importance of its continued maintenance as a part of our national defense; the crying need of agriculture for more and cheaper fertilizer; and the favorable opportunity for meeting that need all compel us to disregard our prejudices, for we are convinced that to longer permit this great investment to stand idle when it can be of such great service to our people would be little less than a public calamity.

Delay in this case is expensive. Legislation is imperative.

This is the historical background for section 14 of the bill which provides for Government operation only in the event that no lessee will make a fair and reasonable offer for the property, and to continue Government operation only until a fair lease can be obtained. Section 14 not only authorizes but specifically directs the board "at all times to negotiate and conclude a lease, and is directed to conclude a lease if it can be effected." The provision in section 14 for Government operation is therefore nothing but an alternative if no other disposition of the plant can be effected. It does not commit us to Government operation of the plant. It is not a Government-operation bill. It is a leasing bill at any time and at all times within 50 years whenever a lease can be procured.

My colleague, the able and painstaking statesman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] and my colleague, the genial gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD] stand in the path of the disposition of this property by waving the flag of socialism. Both of these gentlemen state that this proposes to launch the Government into a new and untried field, despite the fact that the national defense act, passed 16 years ago, specifically states that the Muscle Shoals property shall be "operated solely by the Government." My colleagues, however, found no difficulty in voting for the reconstruction finance bill, which was absolutely virgin territory in the field of Federal Government, and for which in the Constitution as written by our fathers there is no specific authority to Congress to enter. I shall not discuss the merits or demerits of that proposal.

It may have been necessary and therefore wise under the maxim that the safety of the people is the supreme law. Whatever may be said for it, no one can deny that it is in fact state socialism in the field of finance. It placed $2,000,000,000 of the taxpayers' money at the hazard of private business. I mention it only to show that if we are justified in taking extraordinary steps to save banks, we are justified in taking similar steps to save agriculture, upon whose prosperity the solvency of banks and business must ultimately depend. My colleagues swallow a two-billion-dollar camel and strain at a Muscle Shoals gnat.

The question is, What is the best thing to do with a property in which $150,000,000 of taxpayers' money has been invested, rather than the epithets by which this proposal is described by its opponents. We live in a world of realities and not of names. I am not a socialist, but the word socialism does not frighten me from a reasonable proposal to turn this tremendous investment to the benefit of the country by Government operation if that is the only way in which it can be turned. We are too easily frightened by names, by verbal scarecrows. In 1894 the Supreme Court of the United States, in deciding that Congress did not have the power to pass an income tax law, denounced the law on the ground that it was socialistic, that the principle of graduated income, bearing more heavily on large incomes than small, was the beginning of a war of the poor against the rich. Despite the fears of that august body, 19 years later the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution was agreed to, the income tax law was passed by Congress, enforcing graduated rates of taxation. It has been in force ever since. It is now commonly accepted as one of the fairest methods of raising revenue ever proposed. Despite the fears of the Supreme Court the Government at Washington still lives and the Potomac still flows to the sea. It is doubtful, in fact, if the Government at Washington could have lived without the income tax law to provide revenues for the financing of the world war. The same cry of "socialism" was made with reference to the Federal revenue act.

After years of debate four courses are open before us with reference to Muscle Shoals. One is to do nothing with it—permit this $150,000,000 plant to continue to lie idle and permit the Alabama Power Co. to purchase energy at the Government switchboard at 2 mills per kilowatt, thus letting some two and a half million dollars worth of power go over the dam every year and vanish into nothingness. The second course is to sell it, to sell the powderhorn of the Nation, and to sell it for a song and for a junk price. The third course is to lease it, and that is what this bill proposes, if the interests which have consistently opposed this bill will make to the Government a fair lease and pay a fair rental. The fourth course, and the only remaining course if no lease can be procured, is to operate it ourselves until some lessee will make a fair offer to the Government for the property.

The bill provides that it shall be leased for fair and reasonable terms. What is the fair value of anything? It is not a distress sale value nor a value arrived at in a closed market, where the seller or lessor has no alternative and where the purchaser or lessees by agreement among themselves can buy or lease at tremendous advantage to themselves. The fair market value of anything implies an open market. It implies, further, that the seller or lessor, while willing to trade, is not obliged to do so. A positive direction in this bill to the board to lease the property without any alternative at their disposal will mean that it will be leased for practically nothing and a priceless property will be acquired for 50 years at the bargain counter or it will not be leased at all. This section 14 gives to the board the alternative of Government operation. With it they are not obliged to accept whatever the lessee offers. If the fertilizer interests of this country are fearful of Government operation, let them make a fair offer for the plant. The provision in section 14 that the board is directed to accept a fair offer protects them, and, on the other hand, the alternative of Government operation protects the Government and the people who have put their millions of dollars into this property.

As I look at it this alternative is like a sealed envelope lying on the table. When private interests come forward to make an offer they know that the envelope contains an alternative of Government operation. Knowing that that alternative is available to the board, lessees will be disposed to make a fair offer. Without it they will not, but would be apt to acquire it for a mere pittance. It is my judgment that if we do not have the Government alternative in the bill the property never will be leased, at least for a fair rental. If we do have the Government-operation alternative in the bill, it is my judgment the Government will never be obliged to operate it. If, however, within 18 months no lease is concluded and the Government then starts the operation of its own property, lessees may then come forward with a fair offer, which the board is directed to accept. I realize that present conditions are unfavorable for a lease, but I will assume that the board will exercise ordinary common sense and will take those conditions in mind in arriving at what is a fair offer. This proposed lease is for 50 years. On account of present conditions and the difficulty of interesting private capital at the present time, I would assume that the board might for the first few years agree on a very substantial reduction of the rental payments or might perhaps omit them entirely for a period of time. This is something that all lessors do occasionally. They say to lessees, "We appreciate that you will have to make expenditures for improvements, and in order to be fair and reasonable we will reduce or omit the rent during the early part of the lease until you can see your way to make larger payments."

The Government-operation alternative in this bill, therefore, appears to me to be only something for opponents of this legislation to hide behind. It is not a real objection to the bill.

We should dispose of Muscle Shoals. Congress has twice passed bills for its disposition which have twice been vetoed by the Executive. We are now making the third effort to dispose of it. There are some here and in the Senate who are opposed to Government operation even as an alternative to a lease. There are others who would not lease it at all but would permanently engage in Government operation. Those who hold these views on both sides should yield something of their opinions in order to solve this problem in the interest of the tremendous investment that our taxpayers have in the project and in the interest of American agriculture.

In closing, let me say that the future of American agriculture, and it is not too much to say that the future of our civilization, depends upon a large and cheap supply of nitrogen. Sir William Crookes, the distinguished British scientist, only 30 years ago predicted within this century a world famine on account of the exhaustion of natural nitrate supplies. The development of invention, the development of chemical engineering has, however, dissipated that fear if we will but put to use what we have invented and learned. It is true that on account of present prices we have more nitrogen to-day than can be sold, but certainly not as much as can be used and should be used. The fertility of the American farm is being depleted by the exhaustion of its nitrogen, the chief element of plant food.

I call your attention to the testimony of Dr. Oswald Schreiner, chief of the Division of Soil Fertility, United States Department of Agriculture, pages 664–676 of the hearings. Crops—wheat, corn, cotton, and many others—are exhausting the natural nitrate supply in the soil of this country. For example, every year corn takes 23 pounds of nitrogen from every acre of soil. Doctor Schreiner testified before the committee that crops and soil erosion every year are removing from the soil of America 9,000,000 gross tons of nitrogen. This loss partly is met by a return to the soil from manure, legumes, bacteria, and rain water, but, according to his testimony, there is a net loss every year of 3,750,000 tons of nitrogen. As against that net loss he states that we are not producing, either in America or in the world at this time, sufficient to replenish that net loss. The nitrogen plants of the entire world, he says, do not have sufficient production capacity to replenish the net loss to the American farmer alone. As against the net annual loss of nitrogen in America alone of 3,750,000 tons we are producing in the nitrogen plants of America only 195,000 tons, and in the entire world only 2,324,000 tons, leaving a net loss, if the present entire nitrogen supply of the world were applied on the American farm, of 1,426,000 tons annually. The fertilizer industry of America, including all of the nitrogen plants and all of the fertilizer from sewage and slaughter houses and other sources, is replenishing only 10 per cent of the net loss of nitrogen to the American farm.

In view of these facts let us not permit the alternative of Government operation of a plant that we already own stand in the way of our meeting our full responsibility to American agriculture and American civilization.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The first vote comes upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the reservation of the point of order to the substitute been withdrawn?

Mr. McSWAIN. I withdraw it. I think we can vote it down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Goss) there were—ayes 75, noes 92.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 76, noes 103.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia demands tellers. Those in favor of ordering tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD] to strike out section 14.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, on that I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. CHIPERFIELD and Mr. HILL of Alabama to act as tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 123, noes 153.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS: Page 18, line 8, after the word "provided," insert a new section, as follows:

"Five per cent of the gross proceeds received by the board for the sale of power generated at Dam No. 2, or from the steam plant located in that vicinity, or from any other steam plant hereafter constructed in the State of Alabama, shall be paid to the State of Alabama; and 5 per cent of the gross proceeds from the sale of power generated at Cove Creek Dam, hereinafter provided for, shall be paid to the State of Tennessee. Upon the completion of said Cove Creek Dam the board shall ascertain how much excess power is thereby generated at Dam No. 2, and from the gross proceeds of the sale of such excess power 2½ per cent shall be paid to the State of Alabama and 2½ per cent to the State of Tennessee. In ascertaining the gross proceeds from the sale of such power upon which a percentage is paid to the States of Alabama and Tennessee the board shall not take into consideration the proceeds of any power sold to the Government of the United States, or any department of the Government of the United States used in the operation of any locks on the Tennessee River, or for any experimental purpose, or for the manufacture of fertilizer or any of the ingredients thereof, or for any other governmental purpose. The net proceeds derived by the board from the sale of power and any of the products manufactured by the corporation, after deducting the cost of operation, maintenance, depreciation, and an amount deemed by the board as necessary to withhold as operating capital, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States at the end of each calendar year."

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee is not germane to the section to which it is offered or to the bill itself.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, this is offered as a new section, as the amendment shows.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Tennessee on the point of order.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, this is the identical language of section 12 of the bill which was passed by the Congress in the Seventieth Congress, and which was given a pocket veto. It is offered in the same connection as it was contained in that bill. This bill deals with the whole subject of either a lease or Government operation and the handling and disposition of the proceeds of this power. It occurs to me that it is certainly germane. It is in the Senate bill now pending, which has been reported by the Senate committee.

The CHAIRMAN. In the reading of the bill the Chair does not recall any provision of the bill concerning the disposition of the proceeds of the sale of power.

Mr. DAVIS. It authorizes the sale of power, and it is provided that the receipts after the payment of certain expenses and experimentation shall be paid into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. This simply provides that there shall be paid to these States this percentage of the proceeds received.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT). The Chair is ready to rule. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee seeks to provide for the sale of power under the lease of property at Muscle Shoals, and distribute the proceeds among two of the States. There is nothing in the bill that the Chair can now recall that in any way attempts to make a distribution of the proceeds among the States or any political subdivision thereof. The Chair thinks the amendment is not germane and, therefore, sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. All appropriations necessary to carry out the provisions of this act are hereby authorized.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, to call attention to one phase of the matter. It has been proven repeatedly before the Committee on Military Affairs of the House within the past 12 years that the price of the fertilizer that is manufactured at Muscle Shoals will control the price of all the fertilizer that is sold in this country. Gentlemen have been talking about this being for the benefit of the southern farmer. The farmers of Maine and California and every section of the country will be benefited by a reduction in the price of fertilizer, if fertilizer can be produced more cheaply, as has been proven at Muscle Shoals.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all possible amendments thereto be closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. This act shall take effect immediately.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EATON of Colorado: On page 18, line 18, strike out all after the words and figures "SEC. 18," and insert: "This act shall not become effective until those certain phosphate and fertilizer lands of the United States in the States of New Mexico and California heretofore leased and/or for which 139 prospecting permits have been issued in eight States, all under the act of February 25, 1920 (41 Stat. 440 et seq., secs. 211 et seq., title 30, U. S. C., p. 968), and acts amendatory thereof, show signs of depletion within the present existing and authorized terms of said leases and/or permits."

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the proposed amendment is not germane to the section. It deals with contingencies and a speculative proposition entirely irrelevant to this section of the bill.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I presented this amendment yesterday. The purpose was explained at that time, and it was clearly demonstrated, I think, by the ruling of the Chair and by the argument that was made, that this amendment is germane to section 18 of this bill. Section 18 refers to the time when the act shall take effect, namely, immediately. My motion is to amend that section by striking out the word "immediately" and inserting a different time, namely, a time that is dependent upon certain fixed dates that will occur under the operation of the statute of February 25, 1920, known as the oil, gas, and phosphate leasing law.

I submit it is germane.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, of course, this section is altogether unnecessary. The proponents of the bill could have omitted it; but they did not omit it. They put in the provision that the act shall take effect immediately. All the gentleman is doing by his amendment is striking out the word "immediately" and fixing some other time when the act shall take effect. It is not for the Chair to determine whether it is a speculative time, whether it is a probable time, whether it is ascertainable or not. The mechanics of the amendment is that it strikes out the word "immediately" and proposes something else as the time when the act shall go into effect.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT). The Chair is ready to rule. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado deals with section 18, the time when the act shall go into effect.

The Chair will not pass on a number of things that are indicated in the amendment, as to when that shall be; but the Chair is without opportunity to consult the authorities other than the one at his right hand. The Chair will rule that the amendment is germane to this section. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair hear me for a suggestion?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, when I presented this amendment yesterday there was a shout of derision on my right. I did not introduce this as a jest or as a proposition of foolishness. I was serious about it, and I am serious about it now.

Absolutely no attention has been paid by the proponents of this bill, as far as the argument is concerned, to the fact that the Government has already entered into the fertilizer business, the production of phosphate. Emphasis was placed all the time on fertilizer. The Members seem to forget that on the 25th day of February, 1920, an act was passed for the leasing of phosphate lands for production. The Members seem to forget that during the 12 years intervening that industry has gone forward step by step. They forget that in the last Congress we appropriated a half million dollars, which was spent, and for which a report was prepared by the Department of the Interior, and which each Member received on his desk during the month of April—a report on the phosphate lands of the United States.

I submit that it is unfair to every one of the 139 permit holders and to all of the leaseholders who are now paying rents or royalties to the United States Government for this Congress to seriously consider that it will put Muscle Shoals phosphate into direct competition with them.

I submit this amendment should be adopted, and when this becomes effective, that it be postponed until such time as those leases and permits now in existence expire by their limitation or become fixed as definite contracts with the Government and producing a quantity of phosphate and P_2O_5 and potash, which are used in the manufacture of fertilizer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no further amendments, under the rule the committee will rise.

Accordingly, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11051, pursuant to the resolution (H. Res. 205), and he reported the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. RANSLEY. I am.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RANSLEY moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, with instructions to report the same back forthwith with an amendment striking out section 14 thereof.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 150, nays 200, answered "present" 5, not voting 76, as follows:

Mr. WOLFENDEN. Mr. Speaker, I have a pair with the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. WARREN. If he were here, he would vote "no." I wish to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that my colleague the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. MURPHY, is still unavoidably absent on account of illness. If present, he would have voted "aye."

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to announce that my colleague the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. HALL, is unavoidably absent on account of illness. If he were present, he would vote "no" on this motion and "aye" on the passage of the bill.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Speaker, when my name was called I answered "present." I have a pair with the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. BOLTON. If he were here, he would vote "aye"; and if I were permitted to vote, I would vote "no."

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, on this motion I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. MARTIN. If he were here, he would vote "aye," and I would vote "no." I therefore withdraw my vote and answer "present."

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I desire to announce that my colleague the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. WARREN, is unavoidably absent. If he were here, he would vote "no" on this motion and "aye" on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Speaker, it was announced that I was paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. CELLER. I was present, and voted "aye," and I ask that the pair be withdrawn and my vote recorded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recorded as voting "aye."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SCHAFER) there were—yeas 183, nays 132.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. MCSWAIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, COMMERCE, LABOR, AND JUSTICE APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, quite a number of Members have asked when I would request that the bill carrying appropriations for the Departments of State, Commerce, Labor, and Justice go to conference. I will state that I expect to make that request to-morrow shortly after the House convenes.

Mr. SNELL. Did I understand the gentleman to say he was going to ask to send the bill to conference at that time?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. COLLINS, from the Committee on Appropriations, by direction of that committee, presented a privileged report on the bill (H. R. 11897) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. BARBOUR reserved all points of order on the bill.

AN AGRICULTURAL PROGRAM

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, in the extension of my remarks I want to give to farmers and others interested in farming, what, to my mind, is the most sensible and constructive agricultural program yet outlined by anybody. I quote from a letter received from Mr. Stanley F. Morse, chairman of the Sumter County Inter-Club Commission, Dalzell, S. C.

MORSE AGRICULTURAL SERVICE,
Dalzell, S. C., April 22, 1932.

HON. H. P. FULMER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FULMER: Several months ago there was organized the Sumter County Inter-Club Service Commission consisting of representatives from each of the following civic and rural organizations: Board of Trade, Rotary, Kiwanis, American Legion, Stateburg Laymen's Club, Hagood Men's Club, the membership of which clubs includes over 200 of the leading farmers and business men of the county.

The first object of this organization was to try to relieve our citizens of their heavy tax burden and our suggestions to the county delegation and county commissioners have already produced satisfactory results. Our next thought was that our people would not find taxes so much of a burden if their incomes could be increased. So we are now working on plans for helping our people increase their incomes.

We believe that Sumter County contains many resources which, if properly developed, will restore prosperity. The first step is to find out what these resources—assets—are, and we feel that a systematic economic survey will give us this information. As agriculture is our main industry we decided that an agricultural survey should be made as soon as possible, and applied to Clemson Agricultural College for help. Director Barre, of the experiment station, has advised us that while funds for this purpose were limited the station would endeavor at least to make a start on a survey. Director Barre and the two farm economists who have just visited us are impressed by the fact that we have the following definite plan strongly backed up by local interest:

1. A county farm committee of six members and chairman (all farmers) will direct the agricultural development of the county, assisted by the county agent and home-demonstration agent.

2. An agricultural economic survey of the county will be made as a basis for preparing a county agricultural improvement program.

(a) To start with a marketing survey, including production and consumption balance, market outlets, etc., will be made.

3. A 10-year agricultural improvement program will definitely plan, by districts, the agricultural development of the county along sound, stable, business lines. This program will be based on the proposed agricultural survey and an effort will be made to have all our farmers conform to it.

(a) The first important project under this program is to establish a county farmers' mutual exchange as a clearing house for all farm products except those handled by other cooperatives. The Farm Board has already sent a man to confer with us on this project.

Clemson College plans to commence operations by assigning two specialists to making a marketing survey of the county, probably beginning in May. We are advised that the Clemson Agricultural Experiment Station has applied to the Office of Experiment Stations, United States Department of Agriculture, for financial assistance in carrying out this research project to be known as the "Production, Consumption, and Marketing Survey of Sumter County." We understand that this is probably the first instance in this country where it is proposed to systematically develop the agriculture of a county by, first, making an agricultural survey; second, using the data secured by this research investigation to prepare a detailed, practicable agricultural development program; and, third, to push the development of the county according to the definite 10-year program adopted.

We believe that projects of this sort will help lift us out of the depression and enable us to achieve new prosperity, and that as a demonstration of what can be done to this end the United States Department of Agriculture would be justified in allocating funds to assist us in making a complete agricultural economic survey of Sumter County, S. C.

Our discussion with Clemson College indicates that this survey project should be either aided with funds from the office of experiment stations for research or that it should be participated in by specialists from the Bureau of Agricultural Economics as a cooperative project. The plan is that this work shall be done by the South Carolina experiment station cooperating with the Sumter County Inter-Club Service Commission and the United States Department of Agriculture.

The South Carolina experiment station has already made application to Chief J. T. Jardine, of the office of experiment station, for funds to finance this research project, and Director Barre thinks that you would be of much assistance to us in securing such funds. Also we are writing to Chief Nils A. Olsen, of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, and should like to have you find out for us what the chances are of securing active cooperation from that bureau. The main point is that this work should be pushed as rapidly as possible, and we are depending on you to help us get immediate action from the Department of Agriculture. Most of us here are business men or business farmers, and we intend to do this thing in a businesslike way to produce practical results.

With best wishes, yours truly,

STANLEY F. MORSE,
Chairman Sumter County Inter-Club Service Commission.

WAHINGTON, D. C., April 27, 1932.

MR. STANLEY F. MORSE,
Morse Agricultural Service, Dalzell, S. C.

MY DEAR MR. MORSE: I am in receipt of your letter of April 26, and have read the contents with a great deal of interest. I want to congratulate you and the members of the Inter-Club Service Commission for your agricultural program as outlined, which appears to be one of the most constructive and sensible propositions I have heard of.

If we had some legislation with proper appropriation, with a slight organization on the part of the Government, which perhaps we already have in the extension service and experimental station agencies, where we could organize and cooperate with similar commissions like yours in the agricultural States, I am sure that not only would it make our people prosperous but it would mean untold revenue to the Government. The average farmer really needs guidance in planning, grading, and marketing his products. I shall be glad to cooperate with you and will communicate with you as soon as I have some information.

Sincerely yours,

H. P. FULMER,
Member of Congress.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 2, 1932.

MR. STANLEY F. MORSE,
Chairman Sumter County Inter-Club Commission,
Sumter, S. C.:

Your agricultural-improvement program approved and will be taken care of through Mr. Barre.

H. P. FULMER, M. C.

MORSE AGRICULTURAL SERVICE,
Dalzell, S. C., May 5, 1932.

HON. H. P. FULMER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FULMER: We were much pleased to receive your wire of the 2d, followed by a letter from Chief J. T. Jardine, of the Office of Experiment Stations, stating that our Sumter County agricultural-improvement project had been approved. We thank you for your successful efforts in our behalf.

To-morrow two specialists will arrive from Clemson College to commence this survey. This project is arousing much interest both among farmers and business men.

With kind regards, yours sincerely,

SUMTER COUNTY INTER-CLUB
SERVICE COMMISSION,
By STANLEY F. MORSE, Chairman.

Sumter County is one of the most progressive agricultural counties in my district. Sumter is a beautiful city with a population of about 15,000 people. Its people are unexcelled when it comes to educational and progressive matters. Knowing these people as I do, I am sure that the Government, in fully cooperating in this program, will be able to get a picture that will be worth while for the rest of the agricultural country.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11897) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, it is late. I consulted with the chairman of the Appropriations Committee a little while ago—I did not see the gentleman from Mississippi present on the floor—and he told me at that time nothing more would be brought up this afternoon, so that a great many Members have gone home. It is now nearly 4.30, and I think it is too late to start a new bill.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be put in the attitude of presuming to say what was going to be the program for the balance of the day. I assumed there would be another roll call on the Muscle Shoals bill, and I did not think this bill would be brought up.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, there are a large number of requests for time under general debate. I do not see any reason why some of these speeches could not be made this afternoon.

Mr. SNELL. How much general debate does the gentleman intend to have?

Mr. COLLINS. I did not intend to undertake to limit general debate until to-morrow.

Mr. SNELL. Of course, the gentleman is in control of the program; but as far as I am concerned, I think it is time to adjourn.

Mr. BYRNS. I do not see why we should not have general debate.

Mr. BARBOUR. We can only run for a little over an hour this afternoon. The Members have been considering the Muscle Shoals bill, they are tired, and I think we should adjourn.

Mr. SNELL. You would be as far ahead to-morrow as if you should go on this afternoon.

Mr. BLANTON. After we take up the bill under general debate, there will not be more than 30 or 40 Members present, so there is no reason why the bill should not be taken up now under general debate. We can run an hour and a half longer and get that much of the program out of the way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11897, the War Department appropriation bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. COLLINS) there were—ayes 97, noes 81.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11897, with Mr. LANHAM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to make this inquiry of the gentleman from Mississippi: In view of the fact that no order was made as to the control of the time in the House, does the gentleman intend at this time to take an hour in explanation of this bill?

Mr. COLLINS. I thought we would run along until about 5.30 under general debate and then adjourn.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman made no arrangement as to the control of the time in the committee, and I was wondering whether the gentleman from Mississippi was going to take an hour to explain the bill and then the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] take an hour to explain the bill.

Mr. COLLINS. I have no intention of speaking this afternoon, but there are speeches to be made under general debate. I see no reason why these speeches should not be made this afternoon.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, under the parliamentary situation, to which the gentleman from Wisconsin always refers, the gentleman from Mississippi is entitled to one hour under the rules, as he has already been recognized by the Chair. Then our friend on the other side will be entitled to an hour; but before that is consumed, there can be an understanding had in the House to-morrow providing for an equal division of time.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOSS. If the gentleman gains the floor, can the gentleman yield time within the hour to some one else?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly, if no one objects.

The CHAIRMAN. There is precedent for it.

Mr. BLANTON. Under general debate, it is always customary for the Member in charge of the bill to yield time, Mr. Chairman. We failed to have a unanimous-consent agreement in the House, but if no one objects we can follow the customary rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the general rules of the House he can yield for questions but can not yield the floor to another. There is precedent, however, for the violation of that rule by general or unanimous consent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a further parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the bill or report available to the membership of the House?

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, the report and the hearings were available to Members yesterday, and most of them got copies of the bill and the report and the hearings.

Mr. BLANTON. The bill was approved by the full committee to-day and all minority members of the Committee on Appropriations have had access to the bill and know what it contains. In the last Congress several of the appropriation bills were similarly reported and were thus taken up immediately under general debate by our Republican brethren who were then in power; and while I then insisted on first having the printed bill, they nevertheless went on with general debate. Hence they are in no position whatever now to complain.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. CARTER of California. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON (again interrupting the reading of the bill). Mr. Chairman, will the Chair permit a parliamentary inqury?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, where there is an attempt to deliberately waste one hour's time of the House——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the reading of the bill can not be interrupted by a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BLANTON. It can be interrupted by a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And I object to the interruption.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a matter within the discretion of the Chair. The Chair will hear the gentleman's parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BLANTON. My parliamentary inquiry is this: Where there comes from the minority side of the Chamber a deliberate attempt to waste an entire hour of the time of the House, is it not proper and in order to show who is doing that?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no knowledge that there is such a deliberate attempt, and it is within the rules of the House to object to the request to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to waive that if I can find a copy of the bill, but being unable to get a copy of the bill, in spite of the fact they say they have been distributed——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I hand the gentleman a copy of the bill, and now that the gentleman has a copy I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. GOSS. If the gentleman will give me a copy, I shall not object.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is out of order.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is the reading of the bill.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. MICHENER (interrupting the reading of the bill). Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, there is a good deal of confusion here, and the Members do not seem to understand, first, whether a printed copy of the bill is available, a single one, on the floor of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk is reading the printed bill.

Mr. MICHENER. And, second, whether under the rules of the House we are entitled to have a printed bill. As I understand, there is no printed bill, there is no printed report, and the Clerk at this minute is not reading from a bill that has been printed as an official bill.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I think I can settle that and satisfy the gentleman's curiosity. There can be no printed bill, because the bill was only introduced a few minutes ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the Clerk is reading the bill which was reported to the House a few moments ago.

Mr. MICHENER. As I understand it, the Committee on Appropriations has just introduced the bill to-day. It has not yet been printed, has not been sent to the printer, and the Clerk is reading from the original copy as introduced, and there has been no report yet printed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The report number is blank.

Mr. MICHENER. I submit that this has never been done before.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, it has been done a number of times, and in the last Congress, when the Republicans themselves were doing it. Mr. WOOD, Mr. Cramton, of Michigan, and other chairmen of the subcommittees have done the same thing a number of times. And the RECORD will show that I demanded that we first be furnished with a copy of the printed bill, but the bill was debated just the same.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman withdraw the point a moment?

Mr. PARKER of New York. All right; I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with; and if this request is granted, I shall then move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LANHAM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the Army appropriation bill and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, the following leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee, for one week, on account of official business; and

To Mr. HALL of Mississippi, indefinitely, on account of illness.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I should not be discharging my constitutional responsibility to give to the Congress information on the state of the Union and to recommend for its consideration such measures as may be necessary and expedient if I did not report to the Congress the situation which has arisen in the country in large degree as the result of incidents of legislation during the past six weeks.

The most essential factor to economic recovery to-day is the restoration of confidence. In spite of the unquestioned beneficial effect of the remedial measures already taken and the gradual improvement in fundamental conditions, fear and alarm prevail in the country because of events in Washington which have greatly disturbed the public mind.

The manner in which the House of Representatives rejected both the revenue program proposed by the Treasury and the program unanimously reported by the Committee on Ways and Means; the character of the tax measures passed; the action of the House which would increase governmental expenditure by $132,000,000 for road building; the action further to enlarge expenditures in non-service-connected benefits from the Veterans' Bureau at the very time when the House was refusing to remedy abuse in these same services; the virtual destruction of both the national-economy program proposed by the executive officials and the program of the special House Committee on Economy; the failure of the House to give adequate authority for early reduction of Government bureaus and commissions; the passage of legislation by the House placing a burden of impossible execution upon the Federal reserve system over the protest of the Federal Reserve Board; the threat of further legislation looking to uncontrolled inflation—have all resulted in diminishing public confidence and offsetting the constructive, unified efforts of the Executive and the Congress undertaken earlier in the year for recovery of employment and agriculture.

I need not recount that the revenues of the Government as estimated for the next fiscal year show a decrease of about $1,700,000,000 below the fiscal year 1929 and inexorably require a broader basis of taxation and a drastic reduction of expenditures in order to balance the Budget. Nothing is more necessary at this time than balancing the Budget. Nothing will put more heart into the country than prompt and courageous and united action in enacting the legislation which this situation imperatively demands and an equally determined stand in defeating unwise and unnecessary legislation.

Most expeditious action is necessary if the revenues, appropriations, economy legislation, and a balanced Budget are to be attained before the beginning of the new fiscal year on July 1 next.

The details and requirements of the situation are now well known to the Congress and plainly require:

First. The prompt enactment of a revenue bill adequate to produce the necessary revenue and so designed as to distribute the burdens equitably and not to impede economic recovery.

Second. A drastic program of economy which, including the savings already made in the Executive Budget of $369,000,000, can be increased to exceed $700,000,000 per annum. Considering that the whole Federal expenditure, except about $1,700,000,000, is for uncontrollable obligations, this would represent an unprecedented reduction. Such a program, to accomplish its purpose, must embrace the rejection of all measures that increase expenditures unless they be for undoubted emergency; the reduction in appropriations now pending below the figures as submitted in the Executive Budget on December 9 last; a reconsideration of the legislation covering those economy projects which require repeal or amendment to the laws; and an effective grant of authority to the Executive to reorganize and consolidate and eliminate unnecessary Government bureaus and establishments.

REDUCTION OF DIRECT APPROPRIATIONS

In the category of appropriations within the authority of the Appropriation Committees those committees have given some months to devoted consideration of the Executive Budget, which, as I have said, in itself carried a reduction of $369,000,000 below the expenditures of the current year. Considering the situation in the country and a study of the results so far attained by the committees, together with a review by the executive officials, I am convinced that, subject to the inclusion of conditions mentioned later, a reduction of at least $230,000,000 below the Executive Budget can be made in the supply bills—of which some $70,000,000 or $80,000,000 may be the subject of deficiency bills at the next session. In order to effect these economies, to preserve the efficiency of the Government, and to assure the humane treatment of Government employees, authority must be given to meet emergencies which may arise from such close budgeting by the transfer of not to exceed 15 per cent of any appropriation to any other appropriation within the same department, provided no appropriation is increased more than 15 per cent, but subject to the approval of the Director of the Budget; and to suspend the leave with pay so that the 5-day week and its equivalent to salaried employees can be installed where necessary.

With the reduction proposed in the original Budget, together with the further reductions here proposed, it will be necessary to discharge 50,000 to 100,000 employees unless we divide the remaining work of the Government amongst the whole of its employees just as has been done in industry. I know of nothing more inhuman in the present situation than for the Government to add to the pool of unemployment and destitution when it is entirely unnecessary and can be provided against by the same measures which were undertaken by industry at the request of the Government itself nearly three years ago.

SPECIAL ECONOMY LEGISLATION

In the category of further economies which can only be made by changes in laws which would give authority to the Executive and the Appropriations Committees, many items were proposed by executive officers of the Government, and some portion of them were embodied in the bill presented by the special Economy Committee to the House of Representatives. Less than $30,000,000 direct and definite savings were covered in the bill which finally passed the House. Many of the indeterminate and indirect savings in that legislation can not be realized until late in the new year or after that.

Many of the recommendations which were rejected by the House of Representatives should again be considered. Aside from the economy proposals affecting employees which are here included in the above discussion of the supply bills, there are opportunities to increase the direct savings provided for in the House economy bill from $30,000,000 to from $130,000,000 to $150,000,000, plus many indeterminate items which would result in further economies.

These savings would be over and above the amounts of savings referred to in the direct appropriations. Without going into the merits or demerits of the proposals, they do represent the correction of abuses and the curtailment of unnecessary functions of the Government and embrace items that can be dispensed with during the present critical period.

CONSOLIDATION AND REDUCTION OF BUREAUS

In the category of economies that can be made by consolidation, reorganization, and elimination of the less-necessary bureaus, commissions, and so forth, the authority given in the measure passed by the House of Representatives is so restricted that it can not be made effective until late in the next fiscal year. In order to expedite this economy I earnestly recommend that the Executive be authorized to proceed immediately in the consolidation of public works and personnel, partly provided in the House economy bill, public health, merchant marine, conservation, education, munitions manufacture, Army and Navy hospitals, aviation fields, and other specific Army and Navy activities which may advantageously be consolidated for the purpose of economy and more effective administration. The savings to be made are indeterminate but very considerable. If made by Executive action within the above direction from the Congress, they can be made promptly.

CONCLUSION

The imperative need of the Nation to-day is a definite and conclusive program for balancing the Budget. Uncertainty is disastrous. It must be in every sense a national program. Sectional, partisan, group, or class considerations can have no place in it. Ours is a government of all the people, created to protect and promote the common good, and when the claims of any group or class are inconsistent with the welfare of all, they must give way. Various groups and sections of the country have brought insistent and delaying pressures to bear for the adoption or rejection of various projects which would yield great economy and revenue. They have not realized that sacrifice by all groups is essential to the salvation of the Nation. They have not recognized the gravity of the problems with which we are confronted. They apparently do not know that by their actions they are imposing losses on members of their own groups and sections through stagnation, unemployment, decreased commodity prices far greater than the sacrifices called for under these suggestions. The Government can not be dictated to by organized minorities. Such action will undermine all popular government. I know that these actions do not reflect the will of the country, and I refuse to believe that the country is unable to reflect its will in legislation.

In conclusion, let me urge the national necessity for prompt and resolute and unified action, keeping constantly in mind the larger aspects of the problem and that the necessity for these measures is born of a great national emergency. If such a program should be agreed to by the leaders and Members of both Houses, it would go far to restore business, employment, and agriculture alike. It would have a most reassuring effect on the country.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 5, 1932.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, these suggestions have come from the Executive after the House has acted on the economy bill which was presented by the Economy Committee. They might have been of value if the President had presented them earlier. They come now after the House has acted. I regard this message as the first speech of the President of the United States in his campaign for reelection as President. When I have had time to study these suggestions in the light of what has happened in the House I will answer them.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Not now. The President has absolutely failed to make recommendations when they would have been effective. I propose to answer this message to the best of my ability and as vigorously as I can.

The country is in a desperate condition; there is no doubt about that, and the President in this way can not escape his share of responsibility. This deficit commenced to develop nearly three years ago, and no suggestions have come until recently from the White House. The condition in which the country finds itself to-day results from the policies which have been in effect in the administrations which have followed the Wilson administration, and the President has been prominently connected with all of them and has approved always the propositions which have led us into the depression in which we now find ourselves.

The message which has just been read at this late hour, when proper comments are impossible, will appear to-morrow in all the papers from Boston to San Francisco. If it does so appear, it was evidently prepared in time to have been presented to the Congress before this House acted. Under the Constitution the President is authorized to make such suggestions as this, but I undertake to say that no precedent can be found for such a message as this, presented as it is after the House has acted on the suggestions made in the communication. I yield to none in my respect for this high office the President occupies; but when I have read this message and when the opportunity presents itself, I propose to comment as forcefully as I am capable of doing on this remarkable message and on the evident reasons for its presentation at this time.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I want to say in answer to the gentleman from Illinois that there is not a single recommendation in the entire message that the President of the United States has not made several times in writing and in interviews in newspapers. He has stood for economy all the way through, and the people of the country know it; but Congress has not carried out his recommendations. The majority of the Members on this side of the aisle have stood for the economy bill; and if it had received the same support on the other side of the aisle, there would have been no need of this message.

I tell you that the American people will be interested in what the President has said, because they are interested in economy, and they want to know why Congress has not carried out the President's suggestion. The burden is on the Democratic-controlled House; and as the gentleman from Illinois has said, if this message is a campaign speech it is a mighty good one.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is true that the President had one of his secretaries up here when we were considering this economy bill opposing one of the provisions which would have saved a hundred million dollars? Mr. Walter Newton was here on the floor.

Mr. SNELL. He had a right to be on the floor, as he is an ex-Member of the House, and the gentleman well knows it; and, as far as I know, he was not opposing anything.

Mr. McDUFFIE. My information is that Mr. Newton was here opposing the provision.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I object.

BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on this day present to the President for his approval a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 8083. An act providing for the appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy of all midshipmen who graduate from the Naval Academy in 1932, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 6, 1932, at 12 o'clock noon.

TARIFF ON COPPER

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I have a very urgent appeal by telegram in the nature of a petition for the imposition of a tariff duty on copper in the pending revenue bill, which I ask the clerk to read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read as requested.

The telegram was read and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

GLOBE, ARIZ., May 5, 1932.

Hon. CARL HAYDEN,
Member United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The attached signers of this petition, including civic, service, and fraternal organizations, county and city officials, and business men of the Globe-Miami district, until recently the largest copper-producing district of the world, respectfully ask that you impress on your fellow Members of the United States Senate that failure to retain an adequate import duty on copper in the Budget balancing revenue bill will soon result in the practical extinction of dozens of once prosperous communities, bankruptcy to hundreds of business men, and hunger and starvation to thousands of loyal American men, women, and helpless children. If space permitted the name of every American citizen in the Globe-Miami district would be signed to this petition.

(Signed by Gila County Board of Supervisors, all county and city officials, and 217 citizens of the Globe and Miami copper mining district of Arizona.)

FLOORS IN POST-OFFICE BUILDINGS

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read by the clerk, so it may appear in the RECORD at this point, a letter which I have received from Miley, S. C.

There being no objection, the letter was read by the legislative clerk, as follows:

MILEY, S. C., May 4, 1932.

Hon. E. D. SMITH,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR SMITH: Inclosed find copy of resolution adopted by the Oak Flooring Manufacturers' Association, of which we are a member.

You will note that the specifications for the floors in the United States post-office buildings will restrict bidding to a patented article controlled by one manufacturer exclusively.

I had no idea our Government would use such methods in buying for their various buildings. This on its face looks like something is wrong somewhere and badly wrong. I can hardly conceive of our Government permitting such things to go on. According to my way of seeing it, it permits these people to charge any price they want to charge for this patented flooring.

I am bringing this matter to your attention and hope that you will give it the attention it deserves. We manufacture oak flooring ourselves, and it is very hard on us for such specifications to be put into building plans for buildings for our Government. Please give this matter your attention and greatly oblige

Yours very truly,

W. FRED LIGHTSEY.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I presume the proper parties to take cognizance of this matter are those in the Post Office Department, who have charge of letting the contracts for the buildings, but I thought this would be the best method of bringing it to the attention of my colleagues and of the public. I would like to have printed in the RECORD at this point, and appropriately referred with the letter, the resolution which accompanied the letter, which was just read.

There being no objection, the letter and the accompanying resolution were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution adopted April 19, 1932

Whereas the specifications covering the kind of oak floors to be installed in United States post-office buildings will restrict bidding to a patented article controlled by one manufacturer exclusively; and

Whereas several unit-type blocks of recognized dependability are available but excluded from use due to present specifications; and

Whereas for years the individual-type oak-block floors have given complete satisfaction and dependable service but are excluded from use due to present specifications; and

Whereas for portions of the buildings the use of equally serviceable items of standardized strip-oak floor will save the Government considerably, but are excluded from the specifications: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Oak Flooring Manufacturers' Association of the United States, whose membership has included the majority of manufacturers of oak flooring for 25 years, hereby voices its protest against the present specifications because of unnecessary, unjust restriction in the specifications. We declare the specifications as written are not in the interest of public welfare, are unnecessarily burdensome to the taxpayers; and be it further

Resolved, That the members of the Oak Flooring Manufacturers' Association of the United States severally and collectively take immediate action to have the specifications modified to include not only the flooring now specified but in addition thereto other recognized competitive wood floorings. To this end the Oak Flooring Manufacturers' Association of the United States tenders its service through a committee composed of H. E. Everley, W. M. Ritter Lumber Co.; P. B. Lanham, Lanham Hardwood Flooring Co.; W. C. Abendroth, Robbins Flooring Co.; H. L. Gray, Meadow River Lumber Co.; Sam H. Sells, Sells Lumber & Manufacturing Co.; and R. A. Taylor, De Soto Hardwood Flooring Co., to assist in preparing the modified specifications if their services are desired.

OAK FLOORING MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES, [SEAL.] By W. L. COFFEY, Secretary-Treasurer.

INVESTIGATION OF STOCK MARKET OPERATIONS

Mr. WHEELER presented a resolution adopted by members of Great Falls (Mont.) Aerie, No. 14, of the Fraternal Order of Eagles, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it resolved by the members of the Great Falls Aerie, No. 14, of the Fraternal Order of Eagles, in regular session convened on the 26th day of April, 1932, at Great Falls, Mont.:

That we do hereby approve, sanction, and support the action of the United States Senate committee in its investigation of the

New York Stock Market operations and particularly the bear movement, and further,

That we do urge our Montana Senators, Congressmen, and the Washington office of the Grand Aerie, Fraternal Order of Eagles, to support, assist, and lend such aid as may be possible in order that the Senate committee may fully investigate and uncover the workings of the stock-market manipulators with the view in mind of the Government thereafter taking such remedial steps as it deems advisable to see that this apparent evil is properly dealt with, that the same may forever be removed as a menace to the continued prosperity and happiness of the people of this country, and further,

That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Hon. THOMAS J. WALSH and the Hon. BURTON K. WHEELER, Montana Senators, and the Hon. SCOTT LEAVITT and the Hon. JOHN M. EVANS, Representatives from the State of Montana, and the Hon. PETER NORBECK, acting chairman of the Senate investigating committee, and also to Washington headquarters of the Grand Aerie of the Fraternal Order of Eagles.

GREAT FALLS AERIE, F. O. E., No. 14, Great Falls, Mont.

By C. F. HOLT,
LEO C. GRAYBILL,
E. L. SHIELDS,
Committee.

I do hereby certify that the foregoing resolution was duly presented and unanimously passed by the foregoing aerie at the regular meeting stated.

[SEAL.]

WM. BAUER,
Secretary G. F. Aerie, No. 14.

REDUCTION OF FEDERAL SALARIES

Mr. WHEELER also presented a communication from the secretary of the Billings (Mont.) post-office employees, with an accompanying copy of a telegram, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD without the names of individuals to the telegram, as follows:

BILLINGS, MONT., April 28, 1932.

Hon. B. K. WHEELER,
The Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WHEELER: Inclosed find a copy of the telegram sent to Congressman LEAVITT. This telegram was signed by the leading business men of Billings, such as W. E. Waldron, of the Security Bank & Trust Co.; John R. Yates, the Billings Times; W. J. Mulvaney, and many others whom you may know.

The telegram explains itself. The majority of our business men are opposed to the present movement to cut wages for Government employees. If the bill passes, it will hurt business everywhere.

The Billings post-office employees urge you to oppose any reduction in wages or the suspension of any protective laws that would reduce the income of Government workers.

Our present salary is just a bare living. When wages were high in other industries during and right after the war Government employees could not buy homes. It has taken years to catch up with obligations contracted during that period. In recent years many employees have obligated themselves by contracting to buy homes or personal property on the installment plan, expecting that the present salary would not be reduced.

It does not seem possible that our Government would want to deny the Government employees sufficient income to educate their children properly, or reduce the salary to the extent that property yet to be paid for on the installment would be placed in jeopardy.

Our only hope is through our Congressmen and Senators, that this movement shall be defeated.

Very respectfully,

BILLINGS POST OFFICE EMPLOYEES,
By J. H. MAMMEN, Secretary.

BILLINGS, MONT., April 27, 1932.

Hon. SCOTT LEAVITT,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.:

We respectfully urge you to oppose any wage cut or suspension of protective laws affecting Federal employees. A cut in the Government pay roll would react to the detriment of increased business and would delay return of better times.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

AMENDMENTS TO THE LEISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. LOGAN submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 11267, the legislative appropriation bill, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

Strike out all of sections 403, 404, 406, and 407 and substitute for sections 403 and 404 a new section to be numbered section 403, as follows, the sections of the bill to be renumbered:

"REORGANIZATION, CONSOLIDATION, AND SUSPENSION OF USELESS AND DUPLICATING ACTIVITIES IN THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH OF THE GOVERNMENT

"SEC. 403. That there is hereby created a committee on reorganization and consolidation of departments and independent establishments in the executive branch of the Government of the United States of America, herein and hereafter referred to as the committee, the membership of which, by virtue of their respective offices, shall be the President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the minority leader of the Senate, the Comptroller General of the United States, and the Director of the Bureau of the Budget. It shall be the duty of the committee to make such reorganizations and consolidations in the departments and independent establishments of the executive branch of the Government as a majority of the committee may deem necessary or expedient. It shall be the duty of the committee, and power is hereby conferred upon it so to do, to suspend, until the law shall otherwise direct, any useless, duplication, and/or unnecessary activities, in the judgment or discretion of the committee, now authorized by law, but nothing herein shall authorize any transfers or consolidations or diminution of the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the General Accounting Office, the Federal Trade Commission, or the Federal Farm Board as now established by law. Nothing herein shall be construed to mean that the committee may not transfer to these four independent establishments, or any one or more of them, functions of existing agencies of the executive branch of the Government. The committee shall report in detail to the Seventy-second Congress not later than December 15, 1932, the reorganizations and consolidations effected by it, and the activities suspended under authority herein conferred and the savings to the Government as the result thereof. The Congress reserves the right to disapprove by law whatever the committee may do under authority herein conferred."

Strike out all of sections 501 to 506, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following, renumbering the sections:

"SEC. 501. That there is hereby established at the seat of government an establishment to be designated as the 'Administration of Public Works' and the chief officer thereof shall have the official designation 'Administrator of Public Works.' The Administrator of Public Works shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall hold office for 15 years. He shall be removed from office for inefficiency, neglect of duty, malfeasance in office, but for no other cause, and the President shall communicate in writing to the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled the fact of the removal of any Administrator of Public Works, together with the reasons for the removal. The said Administrator of Public Works shall receive a salary of $12,000 per annum, payable monthly.

"SEC. 502. That there shall be established in the Administration of Public Works, subject to the control of the Administrator of Public Works, the following divisions:

"(a) Division of administration and technical services under a director of administration and technical services.

"(b) Division of architecture and public buildings under a director of architecture and public buildings.

"(c) Division of public roads under a director of public roads.

"(d) Division of reclamation under a director of reclamation.

"(e) Division of national parks and forests under a director of national parks and forests.

"(f) Division of Federal employment stabilization under a director of employment stabilization. The functions, organization, and administration of this division shall be as provided for in Public Act No. 616, Seventy-first Congress, and cited as the 'employment stabilization act of 1931.'

"SEC. 503. That there shall be six directors, appointed by the Administrator of Public Works with the advice and consent of the President, each of whom, respectively, shall be specially qualified by training and experience to administer the affairs of the technical division to which he may be assigned and to evaluate the technical principles and operations involved in the work thereof. Each of the six directors shall be removed from office for inefficiency, neglect of duty, malfeasance in office, but for no other cause, except that they may be removed when they shall have reached the age of 70 years. The directors shall perform such duties as may be assigned to them, respectively, by the Administrator of Public Works. In event of absence of the administrator, for whatever cause, the senior director on duty shall be acting administrator. If any director is appointed from the civil service he shall not lose his civil-service status for retirement purposes, and deduction from his pay shall be made as now provided by law. The salary of each of the six directors shall not exceed $9,000 per annum, payable monthly.

"SEC. 504. Except as otherwise provided in this act, the Administrator of Public Works shall perform his duties under the direction of the President and shall have exclusive jurisdiction over the design, construction, maintenance, operation, and repair of all public buildings and public works under the control of the United States, including railroads, highways, roads, bridges, telephone and telegraph lines, buildings, monuments, memorials, parks and grounds, irrigation and drainage systems, water-supply systems, dams, canals, river and harbor improvements, and all other public works which require engineering or architectual skill in their execution, and all scientific, architectural, and engineering instrumentalities essential to such design and construction as hereinafter provided or may be authorized by law: Provided, That the specifications for all such public buildings and public works shall be in such terms as to permit full and free competition by all qualified and competent bidders, and that no contract shall be let within seven days after the bids therefor are opened nor while a protest with respect to the specifications and/or any bid is pending undetermined before the Comptroller General of the United States: And provided further, That the terms of this act shall not be construed to authorize any transfer, consolidation, coordination, or change in the duties and responsibilities of the Chief of Engineers or of officers of the Engineer Corps of the Army or of the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks of the Navy Department or of officers and engineers therein, all of which shall remain as now provided for by existing law. All strictly military, naval, and national-defense construction, improvement, maintenance, and administration shall be and remain in the Army and Navy under the Secretary of War and under the Secretary of the Navy, as now provided by existing law.

"SEC. 505. That all unexpended appropriations which shall be available when this act takes effect for the various bureaus, offices, and branches of the public service which are by this act transferred to or included in the Administration of Public Works, or which are abolished by this act and their authority, power, and duties transferred to the Administrator of Public Works, shall be transferred on the books of the United States Treasury to a fund to be known as the public-works fund, for expenditure in and by the Administrator of Public Works for the purposes for which appropriated, and shall be treated the same as if said branches of the public service had been directly named in the laws making said appropriations as parts of the Administration of Public Works. All appropriations hereafter made for the payment of the cost of design, construction, operation, maintenance, and/or repair of any public work for the use of any executive department or any independent establishment other than for the Administration of Public Works and for the War or Navy Departments shall be transferred on the books of the Treasury to the public-works fund, to be expended by the Administrator of Public Works for the purposes for which appropriated and in behalf of the said executive department or independent establishment, and said administrator shall charge the cost of such public works to said fund in the proportion that the appropriations for such works were made for the several executive departments and/or independent establishments concerned: Provided, That hereafter estimates for appropriations for the construction and/or repair of any public buildings or for any public work other than for the War or Navy Departments shall be submitted by the Administrator of Public Works in accordance with the Budget and accounting act of 1921, with a detailed statement of the reasons for the appropriations requested.

"SEC. 506. That the Administration of Public Works shall have the control of and the allotment of all space in the several public buildings owned, or buildings leased by, the United States in the District of Columbia, with the exception of the Executive Mansion and Office of the President, the Capitol Building, the Senate and House Office Buildings, the buildings under the jurisdiction of the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, and the Congressional Library Buildings, and the building for the Supreme Court of the United States, and shall from time to time assign and allot, for the use of the several activities of the Government, all such space. The Administrator of Public Works shall ,in his annual report to Congress, give a detailed account of the buildings and space occupied by the various offices, establishments, and services of the Government in the District of Columbia, setting forth among other things the number of square feet of space occupied by each such office, establishment, and service, whether the quarters provided are the property of the Government or are rented, the amount of rental paid, the persons, firms, or corporations to whom paid, and the number of square feet of office space per employee in each office, establishment, and service.

"SEC. 507. (a) That the following-named bureaus, offices, and branches of the public service now and heretofore under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior, and all that pertains to the same, known as the Reclamation Service and the National Park Service, are hereby transferred from the Interior Department to the Administration of Public Works.

"(b) That the Office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, and all that pertains to the same, heretofore under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Treasury, are hereby transferred to the Administration of Public Works.

"(c) That the following-named bureaus and services now and heretofore under the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture, and all that pertains to the same, known as the Bureau of Public Roads and the Forest Service, except the agricultural functions of the Forest Service, are hereby transferred from the Department of Agriculture to the Administration of Public Works.

"(d) That the Office of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital, and all that pertains to the same, is hereby placed under the jurisdiction and made part of the Administration of Public Works.

"(e) That the commission created under section 22 of the act approved March 4, 1913, entitled 'An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings; to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings; to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings; to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, and for other purposes,' known as the Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway Commission, is hereby abolished, and the authority, powers, and duties conferred and imposed by law upon said commission shall be held, exercised, and performed by the Administrator of Public Works.

"(f) That the Commission of Fine Arts, and all that pertains to the same, is hereby placed under the jurisdiction of the Administration of Public Works, and all reports and recommendations of said commission shall be submitted to the Administrator of Public Works for approval.

"(g) That the functions now exercised by the municipal architect of the District of Columbia are hereby transferred to the Administration of Public Works.

"SEC. 508. That the official records, books, and papers now on file in and pertaining exclusively to the business of any bureau, office, or branch of the public service which is transferred by this act to the Administration of Public Works, or which is abolished by this act and its authority, powers, and duties transferred to the Administration of Public Works, together with the furniture, equipment, and other property now in use in said bureau, office, or branch of the public service, are hereby transferred to the Administration of Public Works. The officers, clerks, and employees now employed in or under the jurisdiction of any bureau, office, or branch of the public service which is by this act transferred to or included in the Administration of Public Works, or which is abolished by this act and its authority, powers, and duties transferred to said administration are each and all hereby transferred to said administration at their present grades and salaries.

"SEC. 509. That until other suitable quarters are provided, the Administration of Public Works may occupy any buildings and premises now occupied by any bureau, office, or branch of the public service which is by this act transferred to or included in the Administration of Public Works, or which is abolished by this act and its authority, powers, and duties transferred to said administration.

"SEC. 510. That all laws prescribing the work and defining the duties of the several bureaus, offices, and branches of the public service which are by this act transferred to the Administration of Public Works, or which are abolished by this act and their authority, powers, and duties transferred to said administration, shall, so far as the same are not in conflict with the provisions of this act, remain in full force and effect until otherwise provided by law. All authority, powers, and duties now held, exercised, and performed by the head of any executive department in and over any bureau, office, officer, commission, or branch of the public service which is by this act transferred to the Administration of Public Works, or which is abolished by this act and its authority, powers, and duties transferred to said administration, or in and over any business arising therefrom or pertaining thereto, or in relation to the duties performed by and authority conferred by law upon such bureau, office, officer, or branch of the public service, whether of an appellate or revisory character or otherwise, shall hereafter be vested in and exercised and performed by the Administrator of Public Works: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to affect the jurisdiction, duties, or authority of the Comptroller General of the United States.

"SEC. 511. That the Administration of Public Works shall have jurisdiction over the design, construction, maintenance, operation, and repair of all governmental buildings and facilities hereby transferred to the Administration of Public Works and of all of those now under or which may hereafter be placed under the authority of any executive department, independent establishment, commission, or any other governmental agency, except those of the War and Navy Departments and except as otherwise specifically provided: Provided, That the Administration of Public Works shall design and construct the buildings and other facilities in conformity with the requirements and desires of those authorities which the Administration of Public Works may be serving unless the President shall otherwise direct.

"SEC 512. That the Administrator of Public Works shall make annually at the close of each fiscal year a report in writing to Congress, giving an account of all moneys received and disbursed by him and the Administration of Public Works, describing in detail the work done by the Administration of Public Works and making such recommendations as he shall deem necessary for the effective performance of the duties and purposes of the same. He shall also make from time to time such special reports as may be required of him by the President or either House of Congress, or any committee thereof, or as he himself may deem necessary and desirable.

"SEC. 513. The Civil Service Commission shall establish an eligible register for engineers, architects, and other similar employees for the Administration of Public Works, and the examination of applicants for entrance upon such register shall be based upon questions approved by the Administrator of Public Works.

"SEC. 514. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the terms of this act are hereby repealed, and the Administration of Public Works is authorized to perform any and all such acts and to make such rules and regulations in accordance with law as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into full force and effect.

"SEC. 515. That all advertisements or specifications for any contract on behalf of the United States shall clearly describe the needs of the Government in such terms as to permit of full and free competition on such needs. All bids shall be publicly opened at the time and place stated in the advertisement and award made with reasonable promptness after an elapse of seven days, not counting Sundays and national holidays, unless a public emergency will not permit of such delay, by written notice to the lowest responsible bidder whose bid conforms to the specifications. Except in case of a public emergency so requiring immediate action no award shall be made while a protest filed in writing with the officer named in the advertisement for receipt of bids, challenging the legality or regularity of the administrative procedure or any bid is undetermined by the Comptroller General of the United States, who shall give such matters preferred attention. The term 'lowest responsible bidder' for the purposes of this section shall mean in the case of construction work only those bidders who have shown before the bids are opened that they are possessed of financial resources, equipment, and comparable experience in the same and/or similar classes of work as reasonably to justify the conclusion that they are qualified to perform in a prompt and workmanlike manner the construction work described in the advertised specifications, and the term 'lowest responsible bidder' in the case of supplies shall mean only those bidders who have shown before the bids are opened that they are manufacturers or regular dealers in the supplies described in the advertised specifications."

Strike out all of sections 605 to 608, inclusive, and substitute the following, the sections of the bill to be renumbered:

"SEC. 605. That there is hereby created an establishment in the executive branch of the Government to be known as the Civil Service Administration to which are hereby transferred all of the duties, powers, jurisdiction, appropriations, employees having a civil-service status, and at their present grades and salaries, property, files, and records of the Civil Service Commission, Employees' Compensation Commission, Personnel Classification Board, and the administration of the civil retirement laws now vested in the Veterans' Administration, to the same extent as though the civil service administration had been named in the laws creating and defining their duties, powers, and jurisdiction. The Civil Service Commission, the Employees' Compensation Commission, and the Personnel Classification Board are hereby abolished. The administration may adopt a seal.

"SEC. 606. All orders, rules, and regulations legally issued by the activities hereby consolidated shall continue in effect to the same extent as if the consolidation had not occurred until modified, superseded, or withdrawn by authority of the administration.

"SEC. 607. There shall be at the head of the civil service administration an administrator, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a term of six years, whose salary shall be $10,000 per annum. Employees of the administration shall perform such duties as may be assigned to them by the administrator and all official acts performed by such employees specially designated therefor by the administrator shall have the same force and effect as though performed by the administrator in person. The administrator may make such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with law, as may be necessary for carrying on the work of the administration.

"SEC. 608. Under the direction of the President the administrator shall by orders or regulations not inconsistent with law and from time to time, redistribute or otherwise coordinate within the administration the functions and activities hereby consolidated and with a view to economy and better administration.

"SEC. 608a. That there is hereby created within the administration a board of review consisting of three members to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, not more than two of whom shall be of the same political party and one of whom shall be a woman, and who shall receive a salary of $9,000 per annum. The first members of the board shall hold office as designated by the President in their appointments for 2, 4, and 6 years, respectively, and their successors shall be appointed for terms of 6 years. One of the members of the board, to be designated by the President, shall be its chairman. The board shall hear and determine appeals from all orders or decisions made by or for the administrator concerning any question as to (1) allocation or reallocation of employees under the classification laws; (2) benefits under the Federal employees compensation laws; (3) benefits under the civil retirement law; and (4) the application and enforcement of the civil service laws, except matters of internal administration in the control of its duties of employees of the civil service administration. The board shall issue rules or regulations to govern the procedure in prosecuting appeals and its decisions shall be binding upon the administrator and shall be published. Decisions by the board shall be effective from and after the date of issuance."

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 11051) to provide for the leasing and other utilization of the Muscle Shoals properties in the interest of national defense and of agriculture, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

THE WORLD COURT—ARTICLE BY JOSEPH IRWIN FRANCE

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article relative to the World Court, written by Joseph Irwin France, and appearing in the April 24 issue of the Washington Herald.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ROOT FORMULA MEANS "BACKDOOR ENTRANCE" TO LEAGUE COURT, WARNS EX-SENATOR FRANCE—VAGUE CLAUSES MASK PURPOSE TO INVOLVE UNITED STATES IN EUROPE'S POLITICS, HE ASSERTS

By Joseph Irwin France, former United States Senator from Maryland and now a candidate for President

Although the American people, every time they have had the opportunity, have spoken in unequivocal language against joining the League of Nations or having anything to do with its affairs—a judgment that has been vindicated by world events, notably and recently the league fiasco in the Sino-Japanese crisis—persistent efforts are still being made to drag the United States into the league.

Some of these efforts are inspired by the visionaries and idealists among our own citizens, who sincerely believe that civilization has progressed to the point where the different races, creeds, nationalities, and other conflicting forces of mankind can be permanently and peacefully composed through a fraternity of nations.

But most of them have been inspired by the internationalists, both here and abroad, who are selfishly seeking their own aggrandizement or that of the interests they serve.

Craftily they have stoked the fires of idealism in this country while exercising directly their own tremendous influence in the affairs of our Government, until powerful pressure is now being exerted on the Senate for the ratification of the revised protocol providing for the entrance of the United States to the Permanent Court of International Justice, more familiarly known as the World Court. Actually it is the league court.

So great is the influence and power of this group that it is virtually forcing the consideration of the court on the Senate at a time when a host of vital domestic problems, growing out of the economic and social disturbances that are shaking the country, are clamoring for its undivided attention.

CHICANE—HIGH OFFICIALS CONNIVING IN DECEPTION

The movement for ratification of the protocol now before the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate would make the United States a member of the league court under the terms of the so-called Root formula. Actually it is another step in the plan to put this country into the league through its back door, a scheme conceived by the internationalists when the American people spoke so unmistakably against joining the league.

The whole history of this movement is an amazing record of chicanery and deception in which some of our highest public officials have connived. These officials have constantly endeavored to fool the American people as to the purposes and functions of the league court and the auspices under which it operates. Part and parcel of this sinister campaign was the propaganda artfully contrived to create the impression that the court had no connection whatever with the league. This same powerful propaganda machine has now been set in motion to convince the American people that the United States will sacrifice none of its rights by joining the court under the Root formula.

Such propaganda is an affront to the intelligence of America.

The myth that the court is an independent tribunal, having no direct affiliation with the league, was quickly exploded. But should a vestige of doubt be entertained by anyone on this score, permit me to quote a passage from the book Disarmament, written by Prof. Salvador de Madariaga, of Spain, a renowned scholar and historian, an official of the league, an authority on its affairs, and the Republic of Spain's first ambassador to the United States. In his book Doctor Madariaga states:

"The court is a league court. It is the league court; and when the United States joins it, she should be fully aware of the fact that she is joining the judiciary of the League of Nations."

As to whether or not the United States will surrender part of its sovereignty in joining the court by adoption of the Root formula, the international propagandists are on firmer though debatable ground. Their claim that it will not can not be successfully challenged, for the simple reason that no one knows exactly what this strange formula means.

In the traditional American spirit of assisting any honest movement for world peace the Senate in 1926 consented to the United States becoming a member of the World Court. But warily and wisely it wrote into its resolution of ratification five reservations designed to protect this country from incurring any obligations assumed by the court under the covenant of the league creating it. They were also aimed to prevent the league from meddling in the affairs of the court in any question in which we had an interest.

RESERVATIONS—DISAPPROVAL BY EUROPE WAS FORESEEN

Most important was reservation 5, which is now the pivotal point around which the whole issue of America's entry revolves. It read:

"That the court shall not render any advisory opinion, except publicly after due notice to all states adhering to the court and to all interested states and after public hearing given to any state concerned; nor shall it, without the consent of the United States, entertain any request for an advisory opinion touching any dispute or question in which the United States has or claims an interest."

There is no mistaking the language of this reservation. Its purpose was to prevent American interests from being swept into the maelstrom of European politics.

Equally clear was the fact that this condition would not be acceptable to the nations which were members of the court and which, the Senate provided, must approve it before the United States entered the tribunal. Nor was it.

The action of the Senate did not dismay the internationalists. Agitation was begun for the revision of this reservation. Answering this agitation, President Coolidge in November, 1926, declared in effect that the other nations could take it or leave it.

The impasse lasted until November, 1928, shortly after the election of President Hoover, when President Coolidge reopened the matter. He announced to Senate and other leaders at one of his famous White House breakfasts that he intended to ask the nations composing the court to formulate some plan which would meet their objections to reservation 5 and permit the United States to come into the court.

Events moved swiftly after that. Elihu Root, perhaps the country's outstanding advocate of the league and the court, appeared in the picture. In February he was in Washington conferring with officials of the new administration and with Senate leaders.

A few days later Mr. Root was en route to Geneva, while Secretary of State Kellogg addressed an identic note to the member nations of the court, urging them to formulate a substitute for the obnoxious fifth reservation.

Thus the stage was set for Mr. Root's trip to Geneva, where a few days after his arrival he magically produced his now famous and lugubrious formula.

Events revealed that the league and the members of its court had advance knowledge of Mr. Root's plan. Because a few days later the jurists' committee met and approved it. It also was apparent that Mr. Root took with him to Geneva assurances from the American Government that his formula would be acceptable to it.

What an amazing piece of international craftsmanship the Root formula is. Its language is so obscured by ponderous phrases that no two persons have been able to agree on its meaning.

Its sponsors insist that it accomplishes the same thing as reservation 5, for which it is proposed to substitute, but in terms to which other nations do not object.

Its critics are equally insistent that it amounts to a complete abrogation of the American rights and sovereignty which the Senate sought to protect in its reservation.

In the welter of futile discussion that the Root formula has caused, one simple question has been lost. That is:

If this precious formula simply protects American rights and interests as adequately as reservation 5, why substitute it? Certainly nothing but disaster can result in replacing a reservation whose meaning is clear by a phrase-laden utterance that no one can understand.

That is the essence of the issue the Senate must decide in acting on the new league-court protocol. That it will reject this new nostrum, mixed in the crucible of internationalism, there appears to be scant doubt.

The impotency of the league was demonstrated in the recent Sino-Japanese crisis. Likewise, the failure of the court has been manifested in the last twelvemonth.

Far from being the great superjudicial tribunal uncontaminated by the jealousies, hatreds, and politics of nations, as it is glowingly pictured by its friends, it was cruelly exposed as tarred with international politics in the first important opinion it handed down in the dispute over the proposed Austro-German Customs Union.

When Germany and Austria published the terms of this union, which provided that no import or export duty was to be levied on commodity traffic between the two countries, formal protests were lodged by France, Italy, and Czechoslovakia.

Great Britain proposed that the agreement be suspended pending investigation by the council of the League of Nations. Germany replied that a league investigation of the political aspect of the union was "wholly inadmissible," and that she would not consent to discussing the pact as a "breach of peace," but that she had no objection to discussing the legal phases of it.

Here then was an opportunity to test the ability of the league's court to decide a vexed international question on purely legal grounds without relation to political considerations.

The question was put up to the League of Nations. The league council asked the league court for an advisory opinion as to whether: 1. The Austro-German pact was in violation of the treaty of Saint-Germain, by which peace with Austria was concluded in 1919.

2. Whether the proposed customs union was in violation of the protocol signed at Geneva on October 4, 1922, in which Austria agreed to maintain its independence of other states in return for assurances given by other nations signatory to this document.

When the league court published its opinion, 8 of the 15 judges held the Austro-German pact incompatible with the Geneva protocol. Seven held the contrary view. Six of the fifteen judges found that it would violate the treaty of Saint-Germain.

The eight judges who signed the majority opinion against Austria and Germany came from France, Poland, Rumania, Italy, Spain, Colombia, Cuba, and Salvador.

The judges who held that in making the customs union with Germany, Austria was within her rights were Frank B. Kellogg, former Secretary of State of the United States, and the judges representing Great Britain, Germany, Holland, China, and Japan.

France greeted this decision, in which she and her satellites were the preponderant power, with enthusiasm. Germany accepted it with disgust.

Austria sarcastically pointed out that the votes of inconspicuous nations had triumphed over gentlemen from seven of the greatest nations in the world.

More light was subsequently thrown on the political aspects of the decision by the revelation that practically all of the European countries siding with the French view were heavy borrowers from the French Treasury.

Thus the French bloc in the court determined the decision.

This decision was a revelation to Americans, especially to those half convinced that we had nothing to fear from participating in a European-controlled political supergovernment. It showed that draping a judicial robe over a man's shoulders can not take away his nationalism.

Thus the League Court itself did more to reveal its true character than all the arguments made by American opponents of the court have accomplished in a decade.

LEADERSHIP OF THE PRESIDENT

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD two editorials, one appearing this morning in the Baltimore Sun, entitled "The Truth," and the other in the New York Times this morning, entitled "Leadership in Washington."

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE TRUTH

Congress deserves what it has been given. It asked for all that it has been given. Mr. Hoover's message is an unanswerable indictment. Bitter and savage as it is, in substance it is no more than a summary of the proceedings of Congress in the last two months, more particularly in the last month. Any bare recital of those proceedings would inevitably give forth the bitter and savage tone of this presidential message.

For Congress has flagrantly and disgracefully deserted its own standards. When it convened in December the leaders of both parties and the great body of the Members, irrespective of party, pledged themselves to orthodox finance. There is a case to be made, of course, for a policy of spending, of borrowing, and of avowed and far-reaching inflation. It is made by some men of ability; but not in Congress. That body has proclaimed, with emphasis equal to any of which the President has been capable, that it believed the safety of the Nation lay in stopping the borrowing of the past two years, in balancing the Budget, and to that end, in levying severe new taxes and effecting severe economies. Even in the midst of the tumultuous rejection of the tax bill reported by the Ways and Means Committee, members of both parties, of all groups, pledged themselves in a kind of revival meeting to a balanced Budget. Mr. LAGUARDIA, the leader of the insurgents, was no less vehement than Speaker GARNER. And yet the plain, stark fact is that Congress has missed no opportunity to disembowel the policy of orthodox finance.

No need here to state the specifications of its destructive work. That is done admirably in Mr. Hoover's message. And all intelligent people are aware of the details. It is enough to say to Congress that informed voters know that the indictment is true. It is enough to say that Mr. Hoover, with all of his vacillations of the past, all of his feverish spending, all of his dodging of new taxes, all of his borrowing, is entitled to say that in the record of the past month he stands forth as a figure of consistency and stability in contrast with a Congress destitute of purpose and of will.

LEADERSHIP IN WASHINGTON

A Democratic Senator, Mr. HARRISON, calls upon the President to bring order out of chaos. The Budget is not balanced. Tax plans have gone astray. "If ever there was a time," he says, "when the President ought to speak out to his leaders in Congress, it is now." But the President has been speaking out to his leaders, and appealing to his adversaries, vigorously and consistently since Congress convened five months ago. On the importance of Federal retrenchment and the necessity of balancing the Budget he has spoken in no less than 21 messages, statements, and addresses; 4 in December, 2 in January, 3 in February, 4 in March, and 8 last month. Responsibility for the chaos which now exists in Washington rests upon those Members of Congress who have blocked the President at every turn and bolted their own party leadership.

The first act was the decision of the House of Representatives to destroy a tax bill which would have brought the Government's revenues during the next fiscal year within $145,000,000 of its estimated expenditures, leaving only the latter sum to be saved through various economies. The mainstay of this bill, the plan for a manufacturers' sales tax, was beaten by a coalition of insurgents of both parties. A substitute measure was adopted, falling so far short of the desired goal that the amount required to be saved through economies was increased from $145,000,000 to $244,000,000.

At this point the President proposed a plan, worked out in every detail, which aimed to reduce Federal expenditures by more than $225,000,000, and possibly by $250,000,000. The House proceeded to play ducks and drakes with this program, refusing to adopt the Persident's recommendations regarding Federal salaries, rejecting his proposal of a temporary suspension of half-holidays and other privileges, and cutting out of the bill entirely a plan to save $48,000,000 by drawing a sharper line in veterans' relief between disabilities resulting from war service and those postdating the war and in no way connected with it. In the end a patchwork measure was adopted which promises to yield a bare $30,000,000 in savings instead of the $244,000,000 still required. This measure is now before the Senate, where the Finance Committee is changing its mind from day to day on the question of whether to turn a tax bill into a protective tariff.

It is not hard to account for the timidity and evasion which Congress has exhibited up to this point. Taxes are never popular. Economies are distasteful to the well-organized minorities which are always seeking favors. But it is clear that we have reached a point where only determined, bipartisan leadership in the Senate can end the present confusion and restore confidence by presenting the country with a balanced Budget. A great political opportunity, as well as a chance to do a public service, awaits those Members who are bold enough to lead the way to a vindication of the principle that the wishes of special "blocs" must be subordinated to the interests of the Nation.

AMENDMENT OF ANTITRUST LAWS

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an editrial appearing in the Washington Herald on May 5, 1932, entitled "The Way Out." This editorial approves of Senate bill 3256, which is a bill to modify the antitrust laws.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WAY OUT—IV. MODERNIZE ANTITRUST LAWS

By Merryle Stanley Rukeyser

The social futility of a mere negative attitude toward organized business, in which government wields a policeman's club, is amply demonstrated in the present state of stagnation of industry and commerce.

The old-fashioned panacea of unbridled competition has not assured an equilibrium in which labor is fully employed at high real wages.

Widespread malnutrition amidst surpluses constitutes an indictment against economic management in the large.

To some extent, Government bears a responsibility, for the antiquated antitrust laws still stigmatize efforts toward rational cooperation among business competitors as criminal acts.

The effect is to put a premium on anarchy in business.

The time has come for the American people to envisage business in new terms as a mechanism for enabling large groups, such as factory workers, to exchange the products of their hours of labor with the results of the efforts of other productive groups, such as the farmers.

Functional efficiency under modern complex conditions of mass production and the use of high-tensioned power depends on delicately adjusted social engineering.

To the extent that the rough-and-tumble Sherman Act, conceived in the spirit of 1890, when business organization was more primitive, upsets balance, Federal legislation for regulating business should be thoroughly revamped.

The new goal should be to create an economic equilibrium, on which full-time employment of labor necessarily depends.

Instead of the existing arbitrary principle of law, forbidding business acts in restraint of trade, modern thinkers have proposed the substitute doctrine of making the test of the propriety of business contracts whether they are in the public interest.

The older restraint-of-trade doctrine has sometimes been literally interpreted to sanction antisocial acts such as wastage of oil and other precious natural resources.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH, of Massachusetts, in Senate bill 3256 has translated into proposed law the newer thinking about modes of modernizing the antitrust laws. Instead of acting in the punitive spirit, the Senator has described his proposed measure as law "to protect and foster trade and commerce."

The technique is to leave the Sherman and the Clayton Acts on the statute books, but to lift business from the menace of a legal strait-jacket by the provision that any contracts which the Federal Trade Commission, subject to a review in the courts, holds to be in the public interest will be exempt from prosecution under the antitrust laws.

Little that Congress could do now would have such a beneficial effect on business psychology as prompt passage of a sound measure for modernizing the antitrust laws.

COST OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a statement showing the comparative annual cost of the Federal Government for the period 1923 to 1932.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Comparative annual cost of United States Federal Government
[Figures to nearest hundred thousands]

[2] Since the Bureau of Pensions was transferred from the Interior Department to the Veterans' Bureau in 1931, in order to make a fair comparison with 1927 it is necessary to combine the expenditures of the Interior Department and the Veterans' Bureau for each period, which results in an increase in expenditures in those two divisions of $168,500,000 for 1932 as compared with 1927.

NAVAL BUILDING PROGRAM

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 51) to authorize the building up of the United States Navy to the strength permitted by the Washington and London naval treaties.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, by holding back most of the truth and the facts, and by revealing only part of the facts and exaggerating others, such masters of propaganda as Merle Thorpe, editor of the chamber of commerce mouthpiece, Nation's Business, has driven Congress into a position which at times this winter has resembled hysteria. The weekly radio broadcasts by the spokesmen and errand boys for big business and concentrated wealth have brought to each Senator's desk during the winter letters upon letters protesting against Government expenditures and demanding economy and tax reduction. Many of these communications have come from men and women who never have approximated an income which would be taxed by the Federal Government or who pay more Federal taxes than they have paid in any of the last 20 years. These spokesmen for selfishness and greed have done their work so well that many people have been blinded to their local, county, and State tax responsibilities under which they labor, and have been tempted to believe that their terrible tax burden was occasioned quite alone by expenditures of the Federal Government.

Far be it from me to want to discount the opportunity for vast savings by the Federal Government; there is, to be sure, room for reductions in expenditures; but I merely point out who has been primarily responsible for the planting of the exaggerated thoughts concerning Federal costs which have made Congress such a madhouse on the subject of economy, and how thoroughly inconsistent Congress can be when it is off balance.

The agents for great and greedy American business corporations have set into motion wheels which have caused Congress to see in red letters at every turn the words "Balance the Budget." We must, above everything else, balance the Budget! It does not matter that the Budget has been in the process of being unbalanced for years; we must, just the same, balance it now; not to-morrow, but now.

Rare is the Member of this body who has not at one time or another "deplored" Government spending. Economy committees have been established to effect such savings as would materially help to balance the Budget. We have slashed and slashed and slashed at departmental appropriations, and have not always been too particular as to the number of men and women who would be thrown out of employment by reason of the slashing. We have daily shed tears over the plight of the taxpayer and pleaded for a lessening of the terrible load carried by the Federal income-tax payers of the land. When there have been before us appropriations to enable warfare to be carried on against grasshoppers, barberry, and the like, we have often ridiculed the proposed expenditure and have more often cut the appropriations to the bone. Why? For the purpose of relieving the poor souls for whom Mr. Thorpe speaks with such eloquence. We must balance the Budget, not by increasing the taxes of those whose wealth has grown to gigantic proportions during and since the war but by cutting the expenses of the Government.

If future generations will confine themselves alone to the economy discussions which have occupied this session of Congress, they can not be other than convinced that in 1931 and 1932 the Congress of the United States carried the matter of thrift and economy to the highest degree. But if those same generations follow all that this Congress has done and is about to do, they must of necessity wonder what sort of people were serving in the Congress to accomplish so contradictory a record as we are making.

Here we are now, for instance, about to shut our eyes and swallow without a protest a program which can not do anything other than increase the burden of taxation and further continue the Government in the most wasteful enterprise known to mankind. Under the pending naval construction bill upon which we are about to vote and which, it seems, will pass the Senate with an easy majority, we pledge our country to the business of preparing for more war and to provide the additional burden of taxation which war and preparation for it occasions.

Strangely enough, our chamber-of-commerce spokesmen are not broadcasting urges to the public to write their Congressmen and demand that they vote against this authorization for additional naval expenditures totaling hundreds of millions of dollars. Is it possible that their program is one of that kind of economy that puts men out of work and then goes on building machinery which is intended ultimately to devour and destroy the manhood of the land? I am only asking. Far be it from me to ascribe any more reasons than we know to exist as the background of the present interest in Federal economies of the predatory interests of this country.

If the people of America were given half a chance to know just what is occasioning the large expenditures by their National Government, they would be writing us these days in no uncertain terms in protest of this authorization for the building of scores of new battleships, submarines, and cruisers. If the chamber-of-commerce spokesmen were really sincere in their economy urge, they would broadcast to the people the story of what a terrific part armaments play in our present-day budgets.

There are none to deny that our present-day difficulties in an economic way and our tremendous governmental costs are occasioned by war—wars already engaged in and preparation for more war. And yet to-day we seriously consider practicing our economies against those men who went in and carried the burden of battle and risk, who suffered injury and disease, while we authorize larger appropriations than ever before for the building of more ships to bully the world into more war. It is indeed a fine spectacle we present! What another generation or future generations will think of us and term us remains to be seen. I am quite certain, however, that their thoughts and terms are not going to be altogether complimentary.

Let us once again look to our dollars-and-cents burden of war. Observe its growth. I have before me the statistical statement of expenditures for the Army and Navy by our Government for the years dating back to 1870, taken from the June 30, 1930, report of the Secretary of the Treasury. I ask, Mr. President, that this table which is before me may be made a part of my remarks at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Fiscal year	Army	Navy	Total
1870	$57,655,676	$21,780,230	$79,435,906
1880	38,116,916	13,536,985	51,653,901
1890	44,582,838	22,006,206	66,589,044
1900	134,774,768	55,953,078	190,727,846
1910	189,823,379	123,173,717	312,997,096
1915	202,160,134	141,835,654	343,995,788
1920	1,100,865,606	629,893,116	1,730,758,782
1925	357,937,420	326,365,467	684,322,887
1926	358,329,076	311,611,694	669,940,770
1927	361,987,157	322,620,723	684,607,880
1928	400,345,219	337,608,086	737,953,305
1929	427,229,834	364,806,678	792,036,512
1930	466,284,983	374,052,691	840,337,674
Total	4,140,113,096	3,045,244,325	7,185,357,391

Mr. NYE. I want to point out that back in 1870 we had a total outlay annually for the maintenance of an army and a navy of $79,000,000—speaking now in round figures—in 1880, $51,000,000; in 1890, $66,000,000; in 1900, $190,000,000; in 1910, $312,000,000; in 1915, $343,000,000; in 1920, $1,730,000,000; in 1925, $684,000,000; in 1926, $669,000,000; in 1927, $684,000,000; in 1928, $737,000,000; in 1929, $792,000,000; and in 1930, $840,000,000.

I want to impress upon the Senate, if I can, the thought which is mine growing out of the figures with respect to our expenditures since the World War. We had a right to expect immediately after the war a gradual cutting down and a return to normalcy in the matter of Army and Navy maintenance costs. We find, however, in 1925, six years after the war was over, a total Army and Navy annual cost of $684,000,000. The figures for 1926 showed a little progress toward reduction, as our outlay for that year was only $669,000,000; but instead of that process of reduction continuing from year to year as we were working our way back to normalcy, in 1927 we find an increase to $684,000,000; in the next year an increase to $737,000,000; the next year, 1929, an increase to $792,000,000; and in 1930 to $840,000,000.

Mr. President, during all this time we have enjoyed setting ourselves up as an example to all the civilized nations of the world of a people who were wanting to reduce the terrible burdens incident to the maintenance of Army and Navy Establishments. We have, so to speak, set ourselves forward as the leaders in the cause of peace in the world; but while we have been so leading, we find that we ourselves have been increasing from year to year the cost of the maintenance of our Army and our Navy.

We are told that, even though this may be true, necessity demands that we at least keep pace with the other powers of the world and not let them get any particular advantage over us by reason of their armaments. Yes; we are told we are weak and defenseless; that we have not kept pace with the other nations of the world in the matter of preparation for war. So we are told by those who would write no limit to the war-preparation burden which might be loaded onto the backs of the people. And, of course, because we take that attitude the people of other lands are told by their war leaders that, because Uncle Sam is building more ships, they must build more ships. And so the competitive game goes on and on and on with no recession.

But what are the facts relative to the war-preparation pace of our country as compared with that of other countries?

The relative strengths in 1931 of the five powers in the matter of naval tonnage was as follows, according to returns submitted to the League of Nations:

	Tons
Italy	403,905
France	628,603
Japan	850,328
Great Britain	1,250,247
United States	1,251,840

And what of the percentage of increase placed upon the shoulders of the people by reason of armaments during the past number of years? That burden, that increasing percentage, has been, when one stops now to review it, most staggering.

I have before me a table revealing the national-defense expenditures of the seven great powers in 1913 and then again in 1930, with the percentage of increase or decrease, and an index of the wholesale prices. The table, which I ask to have made a part of my remarks at this point, reveals that the percentage of increase from 1913 to 1930 for Russia was 30 per cent; for France it was 30 per cent; for Great Britain it was 42 per cent; for Japan it was 142 per cent; and for the United States it was 197 per cent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the table will be printed in the RECORD.

The table is as follows:

The following table shows the national-defense expenditure of the seven great powers in 1913 and 1930, with the percentage of increase or decrease and the index of wholesale prices:

	1913	1930	Percentage of increase or decrease	Index of wholesale prices: 1913=100
Great Britain	$375,100,000	$535,000,000	+42	116
France	348,700,000	455,300,000	+30	105
Italy	179,100,000	258,900,000	+44	100
Japan	95,500,000	232,100,000	+142	131
Russia	447,700,000	[1] 579,400,000	+30	185
United States	244,600,000	727,700,000	+197	118
Total	1,690,700,000	2,788,400,000	+65
Germany	463,300,000	170,400,000	−63	122
Total	2,154,000,000	2,958,800,000	+37

[1] 1929.

Mr. NYE. So we see how we have been outstripping all others in the matter of increasing the burdens of the people of the various countries with these growing programs of greater armaments.

When one insists that we are falling behind these days in the matter of armaments and ability to compete with other countries, I am inclined to see most clearly that instead of doing that we are really setting the pace which the other powers of the world are feeling called upon to pursue; and a terrific pace it has been, indeed!

Mr. President, if this Congress sincerely desires to cut governmental expenditures, here in the pending bill is the most eloquent chance that has been afforded us all this winter. The defeat of this bill will mean the saving to the taxpayers of the United States of hundreds of millions of dollars. It will mean more than that in dollars and cents alone, for it will mean savings of hundreds of millions to the people of the nations of the world.

There are many very false impressions prevailing relative to the make-up of the outlay which occasions the terrible burden of Federal expense at this time. Those impressions are often given vent in the many letters that Members of Congress are receiving from constituents these days. They seem to think it would be a very simple matter to lop off 25 or 50 per cent of the Federal burden of taxation; but I think for the RECORD I shall offer, in answer to the general spirit that savings would be easy, a table showing where the cutting must be done if material savings are to be effected by the Government.

In 1930 the Department of Agriculture required an appropriation of $79,000,000; the Department of Commerce, $56,000,000; the Department of the Interior, $36,000,000; the Department of Justice, $13,000,000; the Department of Labor, $11,000,000; the postal deficit was $91,000,000; the State Department had an appropriation of $13,000,000; the Treasury Department had an appropriation of $193,000,000.

I am not going to argue foolishly that there is not opportunity for the saving of money in the appropriations for those various departments; but how small they are by comparison with those departments which are requiring the greater outlays! For here is the Navy Department in 1930 with an outlay of $374,000,000 and the War Department with an appropriation of $336,000,000. There is where our money is going, Mr. President—into preparation for more wars and into the payment of those obligations which are going to be with us a long, long time by reason of past wars.

The part which wars have played in our present emergency I think must be realized on every hand—at least on that hand where study has been given to the actual expenditures by the Federal departments. The estimates of Federal expenditures for the years 1932 and 1933 reveal a plan to spend $4,112,909,000. Of that $4,000,000,000, the sum of $2,903,000,000 is occasioned by wars—wars of the past or wars to be fought in the future, our preparation for those future wars. This division of expenditure for war is occasioned by the appropriations for veterans' relief, appropriations for the national defense such as we are dealing with here now, for the payment of principal of the war debt, and for the payment of interest on the war debt. While we have an outlay of $2,900,000,000 for those purposes alone, our expenditures as a government for all other activities of the Federal Government are but $1,209,000,000, using the round figures which are before me.

Here, then, is a demonstration that of every Federal-tax dollar that is collected and expended by the Federal Government 69 cents is occasioned by wars, making only 31 per cent of it chargeable to the other activities of government which are productive and helpful to the people of our country, or at least we hope that those endeavors are helpful. Yet, in the face of that fact, we would now fasten upon the people of this country an additional burden through a program calling for the launching of an armament program, as it relates to our Navy, the size of which can not be gathered at all at this time.

Is this madness, Mr. President? Is it madness that moves us in this direction? Is it madness which seemingly is making it a comparatively simple matter to pass this naval building authorization bill through Congress at a time when Congress is presumably building a reputation for economy?

Is it madness or is it that more to be despised thing, hypocrisy, which bids us, as sane and honest representatives of the Nation, to clip $10 or $12 from the stipend of a stenographer in Government employ and expend it on battleships to defend her from her foreign foes? We rob such of their overtime pay that the humblest member of a labor union receives; we rob such of the vacation which business concerns give employees, and with tenderness of heart we would force upon such an involuntary furlough in which they may go hungry that their country may have protection against the navies of Japan, France, or Great Britain.

These may need the protection of the vast bulk of steel-armored battleships; but neither we who sit here in the Halls of Congress nor the combined forces of the executive and judicial branches of our Government can hide for an instant from the common people that their greater need is defense from their foes within this Republic. It will require no unlimited expenditure for them to gain that. They are not deceived by our lofty oratory on the glories of the American Navy, nor are they unable to pierce the screen of appeals to patriotism which to-day, as ever, have been the first resort behind which greed lurks and works its eternal purpose against the common weal.

I can hear, we all can hear, the cry of "pacifist" raised because at a time when 30,000,000 idle and their dependents go hungry, and another 30,000,000 farmers and their dependents are in the throes of want, it is demanded that we withhold our hand from this prodigious and apparently unlimited expenditure of public money for a larger navy. It must be a pleasant thought to the innocent victims that the Department of Justice must limit its activities and restrict its services in a real war with crime, to give the Navy the means to battle with enemies without our borders, we know not whom, and if we knew we dare not say. The Commerce Department, which might foster trade, must stay its energies that it may have a navy to guard a vanished commerce! The Department of Agriculture must trim its sails in counseling the farmer that a magnificent navy may plow the deep and protect our world markets which, with prosperity, have withdrawn from our sight.

This is a great, even a criminal folly, that we are about to commit. That we pretend to commit it in the name of peace and self-preservation does not diminish the folly. Rather it increases it, for by it we admit that in crying "peace" we expect war, and persistently ensue it. We provoke the very war we pretend to spend millions to avoid.

At times, Mr. President, I am given to wonder, and quite seriously, where our greatest danger as an American people lies. Is it at home, or is it abroad? I think we have had, during the last 10 years, ample demonstration that our greatest dangers are from within, not from without our borders. I follow with closest interest remarks taken from an address before the Young Men's Lyceum, of Springfield, Ill., delivered by Abraham Lincoln on January 27, 1837. I want to be permitted to read it.

Lincoln said then:

> • • • We find ourselves under the government of a system of political institutions conducing more essentially to the ends of civil and religious liberty than any of which the history of former times tells us. We, when mounting the stage of existence, found ourselves the legal inheritors of these fundamental blessings. We toiled not in the acquirement or establishment of them; they are a legacy bequeathed us by a once hardy, brave, and patriotic, but now lamented and departed, race of ancestors. Theirs was the task—and nobly they performed it—to possess themselves and through themselves us of this goodly land and to uprear upon its hills and its valleys a political edifice of liberty and equal rights; 'tis ours only to transmit these—the former unprofaned by the foot of an invader, the latter undecayed by the lapse of time and untorn by usurpation—to the latest generation that fate shall permit the world to know. This task gratitude to our fathers, justice to ourselves, duty to posterity, and love for our species in general, all imperatively require us faithfully to perform.
> How, then, shall we perform it? At what point shall be expect the approach of danger? By what means shall we fortify against it? Shall we expect some transatlantic military giant to step the ocean and crush us at a blow? Never! All the armies of Europe, Asia, and Africa combined, with all the treasure of the earth (our own excepted) in their military chest, with a Bonaparte for a commander, could not by force take a drink from the Ohio or make a track on the Blue Ridge in a trial of a thousand years.
> At what point, then, is the approach of danger to be expected? I answer, If it ever reach us it must spring up amongst us; it can not come from abroad. If destruction be our lot, we must ourselves be its author and finisher. As a nation of freemen, we must live through all time or die by suicide.

Such programs, Mr. President, as we do at times engage in here in this Government, here in this Congress, quite thoroughly convince one that we are engaging in a program of national suicide.

It might be pointed out that our domestic conditions are so bad that, like the kings of an early day, when faced with their people's maladjustment and misery, we must plunge into war and preparations for war to distract their attention from the ills at home. Is this the inner and secret program, the last resort to quiet a people distracted and torn by internal ills and domestic wrongs?

I do not now argue that to be the case. One only wonders at times. Cite, if you will, the case of China, which, because it shunned war and boasted no armament, has become the prey of every wild beast in the world's jungles. China has its classes and ranks and, such is its measurement of warfare that, in classifying, it places the soldier below the caste of beggar! China has been conquered many times and fierce invaders from the north and west, not restrained by the great wall, have fallen upon it. Yet in the end, by peaceful means, it has absorbed and swallowed up its conquerors. They are for a moment of time, but its peace is of the centuries, eternal. It may be argued that China has, in part, become modernized, and its recent exploits of arms against Japan may be cited. This is but the edge, the rim of the country which has been touched with modern "civilization"—the civilization of guns, tanks, and high explosives. Deep in the heart of the nation there are millions upon millions who do not know that a war is on and who note neither its beginning nor its end.

Yet China is not a Christian nation. I do not want to be placed in the light of advocating at this stage a program of complete disarmament on the part of the United States. I do advocate only that degree of armaments which are required to amply protect us against possible invasion from abroad. Beyond that point, in times like these, we certainly have no right to go.

In citing the case of China I have said that China is not a Christian nation. It has no book to guide it in the paths of peace. We, the people of the United States, hold as our proudest boast that we are followers of the Prince of Peace. We are Christians—except in practical things. We read and outwardly accept the teachings of that faith, direct from the lips of the Master: "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth; blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy; blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God." Then we close the book with its perfect theory, and, untouched by the essence of Christianity, we come here as Christian men and women, to vote unstinted millions for a haughty and merciless work of slaughter, and having denied the faith before the world, leave this Chamber justified.

Is the cup of our iniquity as a nation not full? Come, let us fill it to the brim that it may be quaffed the sooner.

Mr. President, I know not what the reaction of people generally will be to this movement to authorize an enlarged naval building program. I can only guess that when the facts are known to them every man in public life is going to hear from them. I do know that the people are wondering these days why it is, how it can be, that a program of this kind, at a time such as this, can get through the Congress without any great difficulty, while the distress and the need of the masses of the people of this country are going unchecked, unheeded, and they are left to plod and plot their own way through an impossible situation.

On the farms of America, for example, live 30,000,000 people. In smaller towns and communities are 30,000,000 more, who can not do a thing, who can not progress for a moment, unless they are enabled to do so by the purchases of the people on the farms from their shelves in their towns. Sixty million people are dependent first, last, and all the time upon Mr. American Farmer. Yet when we endeavor to restore prosperity in this country we devote ourselves and with lightning-like speed write legislation intended to help the stock gambler, intended to help the big banker, intended to help the insurance companies, and the railroad companies, seemingly in anticipation that some crumbs are going to drop on down through to these 60,000,000 people, who, for want of buying power, are alone responsible for the distress in American to-day. We would do well to show more solicitude of the needs of the many and vote against this pending bill. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. MOSES). The Chair admonishes occupants of the galleries that they are present by virtue of the rules of the Senate, which forbid demonstrations of approval or disapproval in the galleries. The present occupant of the chair has once not hesitated to clear the galleries when the rule was violated, and he will not hesitate again.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the bill under consideration is an authorization, merely an authorization; hence it does not mean that something immediately could be done for the Navy. Nothing can be done until an appropriation is made under that authorization, and there is no possibility of such an appropriation in this session of the Congress.

In short, we are now considering a bill which it is unnecessary to consider in Congress at this time, with an adjournment only five weeks away. Yet we have not time to consider a constructive measure for agriculture. However, farmers continue to lose their homes by the thousands because they can not get enough from their products to pay the taxes and the interest on their mortgages. Yet the Congress, with seeming indifference, is already talking of an early adjournment without doing anything to remedy the price inequality suffered by agriculture.

Nearly three-quarters of a million farms were sold because of delinquent taxes, mortgage foreclosures, bankruptcy, or some other form of forced sale in the 5-year period, 1926 to 1930, inclusive. A total of 682,850 farms, or more than one-tenth of all the farms in the United States, were transferred by forced sale of one kind or another during this period, as shown by the following table, which I desire to insert in the RECORD.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRATTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I suppose the Senator is going to put into the RECORD what I was about to ask him to have inserted. If he has the figures by years showing the number of farms which have been sold, will he not be kind enough to put them in by years, so that we may see how the condition has been accentuated in the last two or three years?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I request permission to have printed in the RECORD the table which I submit.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Estimated number of farms transferred by reason of delinquent taxes or mortgage foreclosure, bankruptcies, or other forced sales, by years, 1926–1930

[Statement by Fred Brenckman, Washington representative of the National Grange, before Interstate Commerce Commission, Ex parte 103, August 10, 1931]

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Maryland that the data for 1931 are not available. The figures in this table are based upon estimates made by the United States Department of Agriculture. The estimate for 1931 is not yet available, but it is safe to assume that the number of foreclosures and other forced sales during 1931 far exceeded the number in any year during the period covered by these figures.

The annual report of the Federal Farm Loan Board recently made public showed that the number of foreclosures by the 12 Federal land banks increased 72 per cent during the year 1931, reaching an aggregate of 11,258. While the aggregate number is comparatively small, the enormous increase in the rate of foreclosures is striking evidence that conditions were far worse in 1931 than in previous years.

Even assuming that the rate of foreclosures and other forced sales continued at the same rate in 1931 as in 1930, namely, 130,804 farms, the total number of farms sold because of delinquent taxes, mortgage foreclosures, bankruptcies, and other forced sales for the period 1926 to 1931, inclusive, would amount to 813,654 farms, or more than three-quarters of a million, and more than one-eighth of all the farms in the United States.

Visualize what this means in suffering to the farmers of the country. From an economic standpoint, the losses are terrific. In times such as these virtually every forced sale means that somebody takes a heavy loss. In some cases it is the mortgage holder who loses because the farm does not bring enough to pay the amount of the mortgage, due to abnormally depressed values. In other cases the mortgage holder may not lose anything, but in almost every case, whether the mortgage holder loses or not, the farmer loses by reason of the forced sale because a forced sale in periods of great economic depression such as this usually results in bringing a price far below the real value of the property. In a great many cases valuable farms once worth more than double the amount of the mortgages against them, when sold under the hammer bring no more than the mortgage and sometimes less, with the result that the farmers' equity is wiped out and the savings of a lifetime are destroyed.

The economic loss is by no means the whole story. The mental anguish, humiliation, and social distress must also be considered. Think what it means for three-quarters of a million farm families to lose their homes. Some of these homes have been in possession of families for generations. The farm is more than a place of business. It is a home for a farm family. That explains to a large extent why farmers hold so tenaciously to the business of farming, despite the fact that year after year they are unable to make a profit, and scarcely able to even earn the equivalent of wages for themselves. Their farms are their homes, and many of them, if they gave up farming, for which they have been trained by education and experience, would not be able to go into other vocations successfully, particularly those who are middle-aged or older, and so they hang on, hoping that conditions will improve, but facing a continued and rapid accumulation of economic handicaps.

Despite the distressing conditions which now prevail, the worst will not have been reached, unless something is done to remedy the situation. The depression to-day is bad enough, but it can still become worse. Deflation has not yet run its full course. The wages of workingmen in the cities, the rates of public utilities which are largely fixed by law, the fees and charges exacted for a large number of services, the prices of trade-marked goods or monopoly products, and a great many other services and commodities still remain on a level considerably higher than can be permanently supported under present economic conditions. Unless the forces of deflation are checked, these prices, wages, and fees for services inevitably must come down to the general level. If this occurs, it means a still further reduction in buying power for the products of the farm.

Our farmers have been patient and long-suffering. They have done their best to cope with the situation, but the disaster which has come upon them has been brought about largely by forces and conditions over which they have had no control as individuals and very little control collectively. Congress has the power to act, and thereby bring substantial relief to agriculture. The farmers know that Congress has this power. For five months farmers have waited patiently for Congress to heed their pleas for effective legislation, but thus far Congress has done nothing except to listen to their appeals.

Mr. President, the farmers' patience is just about exhausted. They want action instead of professions of sympathy. It is not sufficient to make promises. The time has come for fulfillment of promises. What promises? The 1928 platform of the Republican Party reads:

> The Republican Party pledges itself to the development and enactment of measures which will place the agricultural interests of America on a basis of economic equality with other industries to insure their prosperity and success.

The Democratic platform of that same year committed the party in the following language:

> Producers of crops whose total volume exceeds the needs of the domestic market must continue at a disadvantage until the Government shall intervene, as seriously and as effectively in behalf of the farmer as it has intervened in behalf of labor and industry. * * * We pledge the party to an earnest endeavor to solve this problem of the distribution of the cost of dealing with crop surpluses over the marketed units of the crop whose producers are benefited by such assistance.

Such were the solemn promises of the two parties. Have they been redeemed? It will not be contended that they have. It may be asked, "Did not Congress create the Federal Farm Board in 1929 and provide it with funds?" Yes; but at the time even a majority of Congress feared the act would prove but a futile gesture, and their fears have been fully justified. The Federal Farm Board has utterly failed. Therefore the pledges made by the Republican and Democratic Parties in 1928 are unredeemed. This has been fully realized for more than 18 months. Since then has Congress provided or even made an effort to provide a constructive measure that might fulfill these pledges made to agriculture by the two great parties? No bill of such a character has been considered on the floor of either body, nor is such a measure pending on the calendar of either body. Yet but 35 days remain of this session, but five weeks. What are we going to do about it? Are we to go home and tell the farmers that political platform pledges mean nothing, at least so far as agriculture is concerned; that Congress has not the will to act? Mr. President, we must act. The welfare of the Nation demands that agriculture be rescued.

NAVAL BUILDING PROGRAM

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 51) to authorize the building up of the United States Navy to the strength permitted by the Washington and London naval treaties.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Costigan	Howell	Patterson
Bailey	Couzens	Hull	Robinson, Ark.
Bingham	Cutting	Johnson	Sheppard
Blaine	Dale	Kean	Shipstead
Borah	Davis	Kendrick	Smith
Bratton	Dickinson	Keyes	Stephens
Bulow	Fess	King	Thomas, Idaho
Byrnes	Fletcher	Lewis	Townsend
Capper	Glass	Logan	Trammell
Carey	Glenn	McKellar	Vandenberg
Cohen	Hale	McNary	Walsh, Mass.
Coolidge	Hawes	Moses	Wheeler
Copeland	Hayden	Oddie	White

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the following Senators are detained from the Senate on official business: The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY], the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. McGILL], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The bill is open to amendment. If there be no further amendment, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

ECONOMY IN GOVERNMENTAL EXPENDITURES

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is not quite ready to proceed on the pending bill and, with his permission, I am going to take only a short period of time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate, and, if I can, of the country, to certain statements in the President's message of yesterday afternoon. I quote from that message as found on page 9640 of the RECORD, as follows:

> Nothing is more necessary at this time than balancing the Budget. Nothing will put more heart into the country than prompt and courageous and united action in enacting the legislation which this situation imperatively demands, and an equally determined stand in defeating unwise and unnecessary legislation.

Leaving out a portion of the message, I read:

> The details and requirements of the situation are now well known to the Congress and plainly require—
>
> First. The prompt enactment of a revenue bill adequate to produce the necessary revenue and so designed as to distribute the burdens equitably and not to impede economic recovery.
> Second—

And I call especial attention to the second requirement—

a drastic program of economy which, including the savings already made in the Executive Budget of $369,000,000, can be increased to exceed $700,000,000 per annum.

Again, omitting two or three lines—

Such a program to accomplish its purpose must embrace the rejection of all measures that increase expenditures unless they be for undoubted emergency; the reduction in appropriations now pending below the figures submitted in the Executive Budget on December 9 last; a reconsideration of the legislation covering those economy projects which require repeal or amendment to the laws; and an effective grant of authority to the Executive to reorganize and consolidate and eliminate unnecessary Government bureaus and establishments.

I call especial attention to the sentence which follows:

In the category of appropriations within the authority of the Appropriation Committees, those committees have given some months to devoted consideration of the Executive Budget, which, as I have said, in itself carried a reduction of $369,000,000 below the expenditures of the current year.

Mr. President, for the second time the President of the United States has asserted that his Budget recommendations for the fiscal year 1933 represented a reduction of $369,000,000 as compared with those for the fiscal year 1932. The President is wholly mistaken in making that statement, and I shall read from official documents in order to prove what I say. When I shall have placed the figures in the RECORD I challenge any Senator, I challenge the President himself, I challenge the Budget Director, I challenge the Secretary of the Treasury, or any other person to refute those figures or to sustain the so-called $369,000,000 reduction of which the President speaks.

Mr. President, on April 5 I called attention to a similar statement in the President's message made on April 4. I quoted from his message of April 4 as follows:

I have in various messages to the Congress over the past three years referred to the necessity of organized effort to effect far-reaching reduction of governmental expenditures.

To balance the Budget for the year beginning July 1 next the revenue bill passed by the House of Representatives on April 1 necessitates that there shall be a further reduction of expenditures for the next year of about $200,000,000 in addition to the reduction of $369,000,000 in expenditures already made in the Budget recommendations which I transmitted to the Congress on December 9.

Mr. President, I went to the clerk of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate for the figures which I present and which are taken from the record. They are not hearsay, not estimates, not good intentions, but the cold figures as furnished by the Appropriations Committee, whose duty it is to recommend appropriations, and here is what they show:

The appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, were $5,178,524,967.95. The President's recommendations were a little more than $28,000,000 above that figure. Now he says in his message of yesterday, as he said in his message of April 4, that he recommended this year a reduction in the appropriations of $369,000,000 below those of last year. I read from the President's own recommendations and those of the Budget Director:

On December 9 the appropriations recommended in the Budget estimates by the President for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, including the Postal Service, were $4,601,479,101.

First deficiency act, second session, Seventieth Congress, $126,250,333.

Public Resolution No. 3, Veterans' Administration, $203,925,000.

United States Employment Service, $120,000.

Reconstruction Finance Corporation, $500,000,000.

Appropriation for disarmament conference, $300,000.

Appropriation for the capital stock of Federal land banks, $125,000,000.

Making a total for this year and the coming year of $5,557,074,434.

I challenge the President to show any error in those figures. By a simple calculation of the figures in his recommendations for 1932 and those of 1933, it appears that the recommendations made by the President for 1933 exceeded those for 1932 by $378,549,466.05. Those are the figures taken from the records themselves; there can not be any doubt about them; and yet the President says that he has recommended that $369,000,000 less be appropriated for 1933 than for last year, when, as a matter of fact, not by my statement, not by the statement of anyone else, but by the record it is shown—and, by the way, if any Senator has any doubt about the figures, I have the several printed messages of the President and the estimates of the Budget Director in my hand, which show the correctness of the figures—that, instead of recommending less money to be appropriated this year than last year the President has recommended $378,549,466.05 more than for last year. I may stop here long enough to say that the end is not yet. We may have other recommendations. No one knows.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Has it occurred to the Senator that the President must have known last summer the pressing need of the country for economy, the need for revision of our appropriation bills and our revenue bills?

Frankly—and I speak calmly when I say it—it seems to me very strange that the President did not call the Congress in extra session last fall in order that these matters might be dealt with. Had that been done, long since—probably by the first of the year—there would have been an adjustment of the matters in question. The appropriation bills would have been trimmed, and the tax bill provided for in such a way that instead of being in the great mess that we are in—there can be no doubt of that—a restoration of confidence and a restoration of our economic prosperity would have been permitted.

Does it occur to the Senator that perhaps I am right about this?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Senator is entirely right about it. Last summer, when we found that the Government was in the hole the unusual sum of, perhaps nine hundred and some odd million dollars, on running expenses, I gave out an interview that it would have been very proper for the President to have called the Congress in session and to have balanced the Budget then. It would have been very much better. Instead of that, however, with an empty Treasury, when we are behind some $3,000,000,000 in running expenses for both years, instead of curtailing expenses, instead of reducing recommendations, instead of any savings, we find that the President has recommended to the Congress for appropriation this year the enormous sum of $5,557,074,434, or $378,549,466.05 more than was spent even last year, when we had a deficit in the Treasury of nearly a billion dollars.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee further yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Has the Senator observed any lack of cooperation on the part of the Democrats of the Senate in every activity that would make for economy and for the relief of the distress of the country?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I do not think so. I think the Democrats have cooperated in every way possible. I think both Houses of Congress, irrespective of politics, have sought to cooperate with the administration in every way in the world; and, to my mind, they have gone entirely too far in appropriating money to carry out the plans of the administration. Surely neither the Democrats nor the Congress itself have failed in any way to cooperate; but they have been remarkably agreeable to any plan that was suggested by which the condition of the country might be bettered.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator for what he has said.

This morning I received 30 or 40 letters and telegrams from citizens of my State asking me to set aside partisanship and to cooperate with the President in all of his plans for economy and taxation. I desire to say, if I may, that I have not seen the slightest evidence on this side of the aisle of a failure of the Democrats to join heartily with our friends on the other side of the aisle in every plan which has to do with economy, in every plan which has to do with the restoration of prosperity. I think the Senator is doing a notable thing and a proper thing when he calls attention to the fact that it is not partisanship which has delayed recovery of the country so far as we can bring about that recovery, but that it is largely the fault of the President himself; that he was dilatory in calling the attention of the Congress, the responsible agency of government, to the need of legislation. In my opinion, he should have done that last fall, in order that this trouble might be behind us now, in order that we might be going toward recovery instead of in the morass where we find ourselves.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator. When the President found, last June or July, that the Government was going to be over $900,000,000 behind in its running expenses, surely that was the time to have called the Congress into session and to have corrected this matter before it got worse.

Mr. COPELAND and Mr. BANKHEAD addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield further?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield in just a moment.

It seems that the administration has been proceeding on the plan that it was all poppycock about our having an empty Treasury; that it was merely a vague assertion that we had one, and that all we had to do to bring about prosperity was to continue to get money out of a bankrupt Treasury and distribute it among the people.

In this connection I wish to say that I think the President criticizes both Houses of Congress in this message of yesterday, and he demands that taxation be placed upon the people for the purpose of balancing the Budget. Who brought about this deficit? Who brought about this bankruptcy in our Treasury Department? Of course, it was Mr. Hoover and his administration. It was not a sudden thing. It has been a growing thing. The President must have known it. He must have known the condition of the Treasury. At any rate, anybody could ask and find out. It looks as if nobody has paid any attention to the fact that we have a bankrupt Treasury; but we have had it, and if the fault is anywhere it is in the administration of the Government. It is not a Democratic fault. It is not, perhaps, a Republican fault, except that the Republicans happened to be in control of the administration; and it is the administration's fault that we have a bankrupt Treasury. The President demands that we should remedy his mistake by imposing upon the American people almost unheard-of increases in taxes.

I want to say for one, as I have said on this floor probably a hundred times before, that with our Treasury in the situation it is in, I am a thousand times more interested in cutting down the expenditures of the Government than in seeking new sources of taxation and imposing on the people all kinds of nuisance taxes—a tax on telegrams, a tax on bank checks, a tax on jewelry, a tax on spectacles, a tax on almost everything that the committee can find; also increasing income taxes, increasing taxes on gifts and estates.

To my mind, taxation ought not to be the proposal of the Congress. In my judgment the pitiful condition of the United States Treasury has been brought about by the waste and extravagance of this administration; and it is the duty of the Congress to cut off that waste and extravagance. I do not know whether we will do it. We are making attempts to do it; and I am happy to see that the President admits in this message that we can still further reduce the expenditures by $331,000,000. That, as it seems to me, is an admission that the Congress is on the right track in reducing expenditures. If the Congress reduces the expenditures $331,000,000, as admitted by the President in his message of yesterday, it will constitute a decrease of about $700,000,000 under the estimates that have been sent in by the President at the beginning of this session of Congress—the most unheard-of estimates, the most extravagant estimates, the most wasteful estimates that perhaps were ever sent in by any President in the history of this Republic.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. I simply want the RECORD to show—and I know the Senator agrees with me—that so far as we are concerned on this side of the aisle, we are committed to a program of economy. We are willing to cooperate with the President, with the Republicans, with anybody committed to the same program. We are seeking in every way we can on this side to reduce taxation, to reduce the expenses of government; and the country should know that there is no lack of cooperation in every proposal which has in it the hope of restoration of business.

May I ask the Senator if I am right in that?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think so. I know so.

Mr. President, to show that the Congress is cooperating, that the Congress has been uniformly reducing appropriations below the estimates given by the administration, I am going to read some more from the books.

These are figures taken from the books of the Government. I am not talking about hearsay. I am not putting up a straw man and shooting at it. I am talking from the books of the Government.

In 1923 the Congress appropriated $312,361,792.27 less than the President and the Budget Director recommended it should appropriate.

In 1924 the Congress appropriated $10,741,504.15 less than the President and the Budget Director recommended.

In 1925 the Congress appropriated $9,024,637.08 less than the President and the Budget Director recommended.

In 1926 the Congress appropriated $12,596,495.90 less than the President and the Budget Director recommended.

In 1927 the Congress appropriated $6,716,064.34 less than the President and the Budget Director recommended.

In 1928 the Congress appropriated $7,753,939.03 less than the President and the Budget Director recommended.

In 1929 the Congress appropriated $9,139,989.51 less than the President and the Budget Director recommended.

In 1930 the Congress appropriated $8,142,294.71 less than the President and the Budget Director recommended.

In 1931 the Congress appropriated $23,784,185.61 less than the President and the Budget Director recommended.

In 1932 the Congress appropriated $13,169,011 less than the President and the Budget Director recommended.

Or a grand total of $413,428,913.60 less than the President and the Budget Director had recommended during those 10 years of our history. Yet this message of the President would indicate that a wicked and extravagant Congress was wastefully using the people's money and that he alone was striving for economy. This is not true.

While I am talking about the President's alleged striving for economy, let me say that a program was put on in this body several months ago in an effort, in the usual and ordinary way, to effectuate greater economies, and every single member of the President's Cabinet appeared before the committees urging that no reductions be made, making all kinds of extravagant claims as to what would happen if we cut off a few dollars here or a few dollars there.

We have not only received no cooperation from the administration, but we have had the most vigorous opposition from the administration. I have been informed—and I can not give the name of my informant—that very remarkable measures are being taken by the administration to prevent any further reductions. Perhaps Senators can give some information, and if they can, I will be glad to have it. Is every possible measure being taken by him to bring about the economy about which the President speaks? No; the effort is to stop economy. Members of the Cabinet come here and testify against economy. They send out circulars all over the country, at the expense of the Government, urging this officeholder and that officeholder throughout this Republic to write to his Senators not to reduce appropriations, not to have economy.

If the President wants to have economy, he should start to proselyte right in his political family. He should have some weight with his own Cabinet officers. The Secretary of State appeared before the Committee on Appropriations and said in his efforts to prevent any reduction, it would be cruel and inhuman for the Congress not to appropriate $400,000 to enable our representatives in foreign countries to give parties, where wine would be included in the bills. Eight millions of unemployed in this country and our Secretary of State asking for an appropriation for $400,000 for wine for diplomats.

The Secretary of the Treasury came before the committee and said it would disrupt his department if 10 per cent were cut off the appropriations, and he has been engaged in sending propaganda to Treasury officials in every State in the Union, getting them to urge their Senators and Representatives against any reduction. So the other members of the Cabinet, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of the Navy, the Postmaster General, and other Secretaries, all appeared before the committee fighting to the last ditch any reduction in their appropriations.

Yet the President comes along and talks, not about economy, but "rigid" economy and "drastic" economy. Has he not enough influence with the members of his own Cabinet to convert them to economy? He does not seem to have. It is true that I saw in the paper a day or two ago a statement that the President, while he signed the Interior Department bill reducing the appropriation some $10,000,000, signed it not believing it ought to be signed, but regretting it. Whether that is true or not, I do not know; I am merely giving the newspaper story. Yet that economy has been made, and the President is trying right now to have the Senate change its program about 10 per cent reductions, and a resolution has been offered by the chairman of the subcommittee in charge of the post office appropriation bill and one of his leading supporters in the Senate seeking to set the 10 per cent reduction aside entirely. That is what is actually taking place. Senator ODDIE would not have introduced this resolution without the backing of the President.

If the President is in favor of economy, for Heaven's sake let him get his cabinet officers and his own spokesmen in this body to agree with him, get them to cooperate with the Senate and the House, and bring about such reductions as will not interfere with the proper functions of the Government.

I call attention to another thing. It has been published in the daily press for weeks that the great shipping companies are getting subsidies of $35,000,000 a year, the magazines are getting subsidies of $25,000,000 a year from the Government, the aircraft companies are getting $20,000,000 as subsidies, as gifts, as largesse. They do not need it, they are not starving, they are not unemployed, they are not without jobs. They are living on the fat of the land. Has the President said anything about cutting off those subsidies in this time of trouble? Not a word. Study any message he has sent to the Congress, and there will not be found a word, not a single word, about it. He is as silent as the great sphinx in Egypt on the subject of subsidies.

Eight millions of American citizens are without employment, and a few dozen great, rich, American corporations draw this largesse from the Government without a word being said by the President, without any criticism; and whenever any man rises in his place here and asks for real economy he is said to be a bad actor.

The President lays great stress on taxation. He says, Lay it on. These great interests must be paid their subsidies. Put an additional tax on business, and pay these favorites of the Government for carrying—as one of them expressed it—a hatfull of mail to South Africa. Tax the American people, says the President.

I do not agree with the President. If I were running this matter—and I am not—I would see to it that a reduction of appropriations was made of not less than $350,000,000, and the reduction could be made a half a billion, if we put ourselves to the task, just as well. But let us assume that we can not raise it to a greater figure than $350,000,000. By the way, the President says there ought to be $331,000,000 more added. Surely if the President is willing to make it $331,000,000, we ought to raise it to $350,000,000, as we could, as I said, if we lent ourselves wholeheartedly to the task, cut off half a billion dollars instead of $350,000,000, and we would have a better Government and a more efficient Government. But I will leave it at $350,000,000.

In the second place, for the last 10 years the Treasury Department has been paying out secretly refunds of taxes for the war years. I presented the figures here some time ago as to how much had been paid out, the enormous sum of $3,859,000,000 secretly paid out by the Treasury Department to those who paid taxes during the war years. It has been 12 years and more since the war, and if we had that $3,859,000,000 the Treasury would be in a very much better condition than it is in now. We would not be hunting new sources of taxation if that money were in the Treasury. While it may have been legalized to pay it out, it is nothing in the world but legal graft. We all know that the war profiteers who paid the taxes in 1917 and 1918 included their taxes in the prices they secured for their wares, and as they sold a very large portion of their wares to the Government of this country, as well as to the governments of other countries, whatever they paid in taxes ought to have been retained in the Treasury, because it is making the Federal Government actually pay back twice, and I would suspend the war refund taxation proposal that is in the revenue bill, and by that we would save $200,000,000 more.

We might lay taxes on incomes and gifts and estates, say $250,000,000 more, and that would make $800,000,000. Then I would provide that the $500,000,000 appropriated for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation be made a permanent bond, because it is an investment, and that would be $1,300,000,000.

I would stop there. I would not put on the people the proposed nuisance taxes, or sales taxes, or any other kind of taxes except to rearrange and increase reasonably income and estate taxes. The people of the United States are taxed to the very limit now, and we ought to stop taxing them. It is cruel and inhuman to the American people to levy further taxes.

I want to say right now in this public way that I will have to change my mind radically before I will vote to put any more taxes on the American people other than as just mentioned. I think we ought to reduce these extravagant expenditures rather than to lay taxes on the American people. And that is what I propose to do.

I ask that a table showing the reductions made by the Congress in the Budget estimates sent in by the President for the years 1923 to 1932 be printed as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Reduction of Budget estimates by Congress

1923	$312,361,792.27
1924	10,741,504.15
1925	9,024,637.08
1926	12,596,495.90
1927	6,716,064.34
1928	7,752,939.03
1929	9,139,989.51
1930	8,142,294.71
1931	23,784,185.61
1932	13,169,011.00

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. ASHURST obtained the floor.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
Bankhead	Cutting	Jones	Schall
Barbour	Davis	Kendrick	Sheppard
Bingham	Dill	Keyes	Smith
Blaine	Fess	Lewis	Smoot
Bratton	Fletcher	McGill	Thomas, Okla.
Bulow	Frazier	McKellar	Townsend
Byrnes	Glenn	McNary	Vandenberg
Capper	Hale	Metcalf	Walsh, Mass.
Caraway	Hatfield	Norris	Walsh, Mont.
Carey	Hayden	Nye	Wheeler
Copeland	Howell	Oddie	White
Costigan	Hull	Reed

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

TARIFF ON COAL, LUMBER, OIL, AND COPPER

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I give assurances of brevity, as I realize the Senate desires to vote on the naval bill. I am advised that the Senate Finance Committee has just finished its consideration of the tax bill. That committee performed one of the most arduous, one of the most unpopular duties ever performed by a committee in the Senate in our time. My compliments to the Finance Committee that they have brought out a bill at all. It is an encouraging sign that they have had the resolution, the courage to press forward in the performance of their duty. I am gratified that the committee has incorporated into the bill an import duty upon coal, lumber, oil, and copper. I wish to speak upon the necessity of affording adequate safeguards to these commodities.

The Government of the United States owes no man a living. Indeed, it was ordained at the beginning of time that mankind, so far as earning his subsistence was concerned, should be put upon his mettle until the end of the film. Therefore we shall look in vain for any panacea or any heaven-born plan under and by which the Government will give to anyone a living. But it is equally true that this Government owes to every citizen—mark, I say citizen—a fair chance to earn a decent living, and the Government which fails to afford such opportunity neglects and is remiss in one of its most vitally important functions.

Our own country is one of such vast and varied resources that it is or should be able to afford all industrious, well-meaning, and capable persons an opportunity to earn a living and to feel free from the specter of insecurity and distress arising from unemployment. It ought especially to be the concern of American statesmen to see to it that these economic maladjustments which sweep away the savings of well-meaning and industrious persons shall not also deprive them of an opportunity to earn a living.

Mr. President, in debate in forum and in court we learn by instinct to discount the statement of the man who comes speaking in superlatives. I always suspect the soundness of the argument of the man who speaks in superlatives. It argues either a poverty of expression or an indolence of research. But I shall refer now to a speech delivered in the Senate on the 28th of last March by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], in which speech that Senator dealt in superlatives, but he can not be accused of being deficient in scholarship or of remissness or indolence in research. The Senator said at page 6908 of the RECORD:

> The governors of at least 14 States have laid their petitions upon the bar of the Senate, praying for this vitally essential relief—
> A tariff on copper—
> It is just as much a relief proposition as it is to protect the victims of fire or flood, or drought or famine. It is a famine and nothing else. It is a matter of life and death.

Skeptical and wary as I am of those speeches abounding in superlatives, this speech of the able junior Senator from Michigan is exempt, and justly exempt, from the general criticism that falls upon speeches dealing in superlatives, because every word he uttered is literally true and within the common knowledge of every well-informed person.

The Senator from Michigan proceeded:

> There can be no criticism of Democratic Senators who join in asking protection for copper under such circumstances, and there can be no defense for Republican Senators who join in denying the relief.
> The victims of this copper tragedy confront a lethal menace entirely beyond their control but entirely within our control. It is a menace which has developed since the Smoot-Hawley bill was passed, because it is only recently that the full exposure to ruinous African competition has become apparent—an exposure to fatal competition with unbelievably rich ore and with native labor which the United States Tariff Commission reports to run down as low as 5 and 6 cents a day in compensation. The commission joins in writing a warrant for copper tariff relief.

Mr. President, I am strongly tempted at this time, but I shall not do so, to descant upon the reasons which have transformed America within a space of 150 years from scattered agrarian colonies into a powerful nation. Suffice to say that in this transformation, in which the lamp of Aladdin, the purse of Fortunatus, and the philosopher's stone appear tame and commonplace, free trade made practically no contribution.

In my opinion, it is one of the worthy objects of the American Government to preserve the American market for the American producer, and thus maintain the American wage scale by safeguarding our workmen against ruinous foreign competition. On the 15th of last March there was presented to the Treasury Department a petition—signed by numerous civic, business, political, and patriotic societies throughout the United States—urging that manufactured articles and raw materials produced in Soviet Russia be denied admission into the United States when such manufactured articles and raw materials were produced by slave labor, conscript labor, or convict or forced labor. For example, Mr. President, manganese ore mined in Russia by forced and conscript and convict labor is being shipped to the United States in such quantities as to strangle completely the American production, whereas if it were not for these Russian ores produced by forced, conscript, or convict labor and imported into this country, the American production of manganese would be adequate for our needs, and we would also be relieved of the necessity of depending upon a foreign country for our supply.

Likewise, Mr. President, lumber produced in Soviet Russia by forced, convict, and conscript labor is brought into the United States and sold at such low prices that the American working men in the sawmills and in the lumber woods of this country have been practically beggared.

Here on my right sits the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], and here is the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL], and I observe also the Senators from Oregon, who may testify with a nearer approach to accuracy than I that the lumber industry in the Northwest has been nearly destroyed and is in danger of extermination by reason of the influx of foreign lumber produced by cheap, by forced, conscript, or convict labor. I lay it down not only as a rule of political philosophy but also as a rule of moral philosophy that the American working man and the American business man should not be required to compete with the ruinous, the insensate, the forced, and convict labor of Soviet Russia or of any other country.

The deadly peril to which the copper, the oil, the coal, the lumber, and the manganese interests of this country are now exposed undoubtedly caused the Finance Committee, unusual though such procedure was, to include tariff duties in the tax bill, and to provide some safeguard for American copper, lumber, oil, and coal. No doubt the Senate Committee on Finance had also in mind that a tariff revenue duty on these commodities would bring into the Treasury of the United States a vast deal, indeed, millions of dollars annually, of much-needed revenue.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Will the Senator permit me to corroborate or indorse his thought? There are a number of very intelligent and altogether honorable members of the committee who perhaps are opposed to a tariff for protection purposes but who, without any embarrassment, can vote to put oil, for example, on the dutiable list as a purely revenue-raising proposition. That also would apply to coal, to copper, and to lumber, and would apply to other fundamental great national industries. I favor so dealing with those industries, as sources of revenue and for protection to those industries.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I now discuss, for example, copper; for it so happens that I know more about the copper-mining industry than I do about coal or oil or even lumber. As has been pointed out, recently there have been discoveries of enormously rich copper deposits in South America and in Africa, where copper is produced by workmen who are paid only a few pennies a day for their labor. This ruinous competition has closed or will within a few weeks close every copper mine in the United States. But, if the copper-mining industry in the United States may be reasonably secured against the influx of this foreign copper, produced by labor paid 7 or 10 cents a day, the American copper-mining industry will flourish; it will again take its place in the economy of the Nation.

Unless such protection be and speedily is accorded, there will soon be 150,000 American copper miners, copper-smelter men, nearly all of them men of family, who will be denied any opportunity further to earn their daily bread in America, the land of their birth.

Copper is the most important nonferrous metal. It has been mined in the United States for more than 80 years, and during that space of time towns and cities have been builded around the copper mines. In these copper-mining towns and cities will be found beauty and order, a regularity of life, and a culture comparing most favorably with that of any other city or town of like population in the United States. These American copper-mining towns depend solely and only upon the production of or smelting of copper for their continued existence. The unrestricted flow of cheaply mined copper from foreign countries will exterminate not only these towns and cities but, I repeat, will drive to infinite despair those proud and industrious citizens—copper miners—who are not beggars but who are asking only the American privilege of earning a living, and who may justly point the finger of reproach at a quality of statesmanship that does not put forward an effort to relieve this distress.

If the copper-mining industry be safeguarded against the influx of foreign copper, produced by cheap, insensate, slave labor, and if the oil and lumber and manganese and coal industries may likewise be safeguarded against foreign cheap production, the American workman in these industries will have a fair chance.

If you grant an adequate safeguarding tariff duty upon imported copper, you will find new life pulsating in the copper mines; you will find a new hope in the hearts of a hundred and fifty thousand workingmen in the copper mines and smelters, most of them, I repeat, men of family who now see at their doors the wolf with its long white fangs snapping at their dear ones, and they pathetically helpless to move and unable to aid themselves or their families.

Mr. President, if the copper-mining industry shall be revived and restored, then in the shafts and the tunnels of the copper mines, where now there is silence and the darkness of the heart of the pyramids, will come the light of the miner's carbide lamps, and then will be heard again the thud of the drill; the mines will pour the red metal into the veins and channels of trade. Plumes of smoke will be seen by day pouring from the smelter stacks and flashes from the furnaces and slag dumps will illuminate the midnight sky. Then, too, if copper be restored, the cities and towns of the copper-mining regions, now about to be covered with the dust of the valley, now about to be infested by the bats and owls of the mountains or the reptilia of the desert—these copper-mining towns and copper-mining camps, where there have been erected temples to religion, temples to art and to industry, now about to fall into disrepair and ultimate ruin—will breathe anew and throb with a mighty and a cleansing energy, and happy and contented workmen will thank their Creator and will revere their country's flag. So, I say, despite the criticism falling like a flail upon the heads of the Finance Committee, although with their bill in all particulars I do not agree, I wish them to know that I appreciate their efforts and their labors.

Mr. President, when I was a small boy, I went away from home to see the world; I finally reached northern California. There was a political campaign on in that State at that time—it was in 1886 or 1888—and I went out to hear a candidate make a speech. He said, amongst other things, "Send me to the State capital, and I will bring back a tax bill satisfactory to everybody." I nudged my youthful companion and said, "Let us go; this speaker has a leaky brain pan; he says he is going to write a tax bill satisfactory to everybody, when there never was and there never will be a tax bill satisfactory to everybody."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator, while giving his beautiful description of the campaign meeting in northern California, pointed so directly, I thought, to the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] that I am anxious to know whether his youthful companion to whom he referred was the great Senator from California himself.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; it was not.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have had the honor to be personally acquainted with the junior Senator from California for more than 45 years. When I first met him, I was a rustic youth, not dry behind the ears, and he was then giving evidence of that scholarship and that devotion to the public weal that now mark his career. Likewise, Mr. President, I have known and esteemed the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] for a long period. I am proud to say that these two Senators, who, apparently, at times do not agree with respect to their political philosophy, have made great contributions to the public service, and no State represented in the United States Senate as well as is the State of California has a right to complain.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. Just let me finish the sentence.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I wanted to pay a tribute to Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I have more than an admiration for the Senators from California; I have almost a brotherly affection for them. I owe them a vote of thanks for the efforts they have put forth in the attempt to secure justice for the copper interests of the country, even though California, while a producer of copper, is not a heavy producer.

Mr. President, it has often been said—and I regard the statement as an injustice to myself—that I am filled with bitterness and a desire for revenge, and that what ought to be the milk of human kindness in my system has turned to some sort of sour lacteal fluid because these Senators inflicted upon me a terrific defeat over the Boulder Dam contest. I have not the time in this busy world to examine the scars that I receive in battle, but I press forward to other duties; and I am proud to say that the scars I received in the Senate in the battle, inflicted by California Senators, over Boulder Dam do not appear upon my back or below the belt, but they are on the chest, and no man who is a sportsman or a statesman objects to scars on his chest inflicted by his opponents.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator be good enough to yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I can not let the incident pass without saying that the distinguished, thoughtful, and ever-courteous Senator from Arizona has paid an undue tribute to the humble representatives in the Senate from California. Permit me to add that no State in this Union has more vigilant, observant, capable representatives in this body than the splendid State of Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. A little before the year 1886 I had the honor of being assistant blacksmith in the old Cold Spring gravel mine, in Nevada County. Later I advanced and lighted the street lamps in San Jose. During that period, however, I had the great pleasure, which has lingered with me, of knowing the Senator from Arizona; and I hope that God will be good to him and that the people of Arizona will keep him here until the final curtain falls.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is most kind. I must hurry along; but before I finish let me say that I should be deficient in what I conceive to be my duty if I did not at this time testify to the debt of gratitude or at least make some gesture toward acknowledging the debt of gratitude I owe to the distinguished Democratic minority leader, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

I do not know whether or not he agrees with my philosophy as to the tariff. He has not sought to instruct me as to my duty in the matter. One of the reasons why he has risen to great heights of leadership, one of the reasons why he is the Democratic minority leader, is because of the broad and liberal judgment he at all times employs with respect to his fellow Senators and all other persons. I at least owe him my gratitude, and I now tender to him my thanks for his refusal to permit a Democratic caucus—if anyone ever thought of such procedure on this subject—to commit any Senator on this question. I should, indeed, be most remiss in my duty if I did not here and now say that the Democratic leader of the minority [Mr. ROBINSON] on this subject as on all other subjects has exhibited no censorious attitude toward any Senator for taking any position such Senator sees fit to take with respect to the tariff or any other question; and Senator ROBINSON, by his courageous and exalted leadership, has served his country and his party superbly. He has led his party to that ennobling ideal that truth shall conquer every falsehood.

A vast deal of pessimism is in our land. We are told that America is in the doldrums. That may be; but she will arise, Mr. President. The final chapter has not been written for her. I do not believe our country has reached the point where she belongs exclusively to the past; but we have reached the position where the past belongs to her. If we but extend to the copper producers, the oil producers, the manganese producers, the lumber producers, the coal producers, exemption and freedom from this ruinous, cheap, insensate competition, then the workmen earning a subsistence in these industries will be able to say, "Whatever may have been my distress in the immediate past, mine is now the shining future."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9349) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes; requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. OLIVER of Alabama, Mr. GRIFFIN, Mr. CANNON, Mr. BLANTON, Mr. SHREVE, and Mr. TINKHAM were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, JUSTICE, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9349) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. JONES. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. JONES, Mr. HALE, Mr. MOSES, Mr. MCKELLAR, and Mr. BROUSSARD conferees on the part of the Senate.

NAVAL BUILDING PROGRAM

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 51) to authorize the building up of the United States Navy to the strength permitted by the Washington and London naval treaties.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, prior to the adjournment yesterday I secured the floor and discussed for a short time what I conceived to be a question of importance, namely, the stabilization of silver and its restoration to a proper monetary status. Before completing my remarks I yielded the floor to the minority leader, and he was followed by several other Senators, with the result that I was denied an opportunity to conclude what I desired to say upon that subject. However, fearing that if I should now continue a discussion of the silver question, the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] would charge me with a design to filibuster against the pending naval bill, which authorizes new naval construction at a cost of approximately $1,000,000,000, I shall therefore address myself to the pending measure.

Mr. President, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] has just paid compliments to Senators, and in effect indicated that peace and prosperity will soon be at our door. I fear that I shall sound a discordant note in expressing opposition to the pending measure and disapproval of the members of the Naval Affairs Committee in favorably reporting the same and urging its passage. At this particular juncture I regard it as unfortunate that a bill should be favorably reported calling for nearly $1,000,000,000 to be expended within the next four years in the construction of war vessels. In my opinion the passage of this measure will have a disturbing effect throughout the world; it is calculated to interfere with the efforts now being made at the Geneva conference to limit naval armaments and promote cooperation among the nations in the interest of peace. I confess to a lack of understanding of the psychology of Senators and others who at this rather critical period in the history of the world demand the passage of a measure which will wring from the burdened taxpayers of the United States $1,000,000,000, in addition to the almost unbearable burdens now resting upon them, to be expended between now and 1936, for the construction of vessels of war.

The introduction of this bill has produced disquietude in the minds of peoples in other nations, and they have been led to wonder why the United States, with its unchallenged material supremacy and its invulnerability to attack, in advance of the report of the disarmament conference now in session at Geneva, should manifest, as they believe, a spirit hostile to the adoption of plans that will eventuate in world disarmament. We invite world criticism by measures of this kind, particularly in view of the fact that the United States not only signed the Kellogg-Briand pact in which there was a renunciation of war as an instrument of national policy, and a solemn pledge to settle all disputes by pacific means, but was, in association with France, the originator of such policy.

In all parts of the world there is economic distress, and poverty and want have laid their cruel hands upon millions. Men everywhere are seeking employment; they want peace and opportunity to labor and to contribute to world prosperity. It is true that there are animosities and rivalries that disturb and divide; there are teachers and preachers of a narrow bigoted nationalism whose influence is an obstacle to national peace and international good will and understanding; but the voice of the overwhelming majority of the people everywhere is for peace.

It has been said that political governments can not be trusted to preserve peace, and that the people alone can destroy the evil forces that produce discord and war. This Government is in a position—as I have often said—to assume world initiative in all great moral and spiritual movements. Certainly it is in a position to aid in bringing about economic revival and in lifting the world from the gloom and depression which everywhere exist. But unfortunately our Nation does not seize the opportunity within its grasp, and drifts, as other nations are drifting, apparently without an objective. There are unorganized moral, progressive, and humanitarian forces sufficient to integrate society and exorcise from the minds of men the fears and despair by which they are bound. Never before was the world in greater need of leaders. Peoples are bewildered, and their bewilderment produces fear and distrust and, in some instances, anger and animosity.

The people are still suffering from the shock of the World War. Its horrors are still before them as a frightful specter. They are oppressed by the burdens which the war has imposed, and bowed beneath debts, national and international, they seek amelioration from physical as well as mental troubles confronting them. They have learned of the treaties that were negotiated pledging the signatories thereto to the settlement of all controversies without resort to war; they read in the Versailles treaty and other international conventions that nations solemnly declared for disarmament, for the abolition of war. They believed that a new day had dawned and that humanity was to be relieved of military burdens and would no longer be required to fight fruitless battles. I repeat that the world is looking for leadership—men who have vision and understanding and who perceive that if war is to continue among nations, civilization, if not destroyed, will be arrested in its progress.

Mr. President, it seems to me that conditions in our own country, as well as throughout the world, demand that, instead of considering measures such as the one before us, there should be a consideration of plans and policies for economic rehabilitation and for international cooperation. Instead of wringing from the people of the United States $1,000,000,000 for war vessels, we should be devising plans to provide for unemployment, to secure the revival of business and industry, to increase international trade, and to promote fellowship and cooperation among all peoples. We should be strengthening the hands of our delegates who are attending the Geneva disarmament conference; we should be insisting that they should support every proposition looking to the reduction of armament and the relief of the world from military burdens. While our delegates are presumably seeking to bring about world disarmament, we devote our energies to secure legislation calling for $1,000,000,000 for new naval construction and also to secure the passage of Army and Navy bills which call for approximately $800,000,000 more to be expended during the next fiscal year to meet the ordinary expenses of the Army and the Navy.

But the Senator from Maine contends that there is nothing in the bill before us which compels the commencement or the actual construction of the war vessels authorized by the measure before us, and in the report which he submits states that the enactment of this measure into law will have a "stabilizing effect on world affairs." How it will stabilize world affairs it is difficult to conjecture. Undoubtedly it will arouse fears and apprehensions upon the part of other governments and afford arguments for the militarists who are fighting for larger appropriations. Instead of stabilizing conditions, it will, in my opinion, still further tend to unsettle conditions and to provoke further discontent and arouse fears and resentments which will constitute impediments and obstacles to peace and international cooperation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. While this bill does not provide for naval construction for this year, unquestionably it will set wheels in motion for large appropriations next year for the purpose of carrying out the program. Otherwise it would not be introduced.

What I want to ask the Senator is, What does the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee say about this recommendation of the President yesterday?

Such a program—

The one he has just suggested—to accomplish its purpose must embrace the rejection of all measures that increase expenditures unless they be for undoubted emergency.

Is it claimed that to prepare for appropriations next year is an "undoubted emergency" at this time?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before replying to the Senator, may I say that the Finance Committee, of which I am a member, have been wrestling for days with the pressing problem of obtaining revenues to meet the expenses of the Government. It is imperative that revenues be obtained to meet governmental expenditures. Unfortunately, during the past few years the expenses of the Government have been in excess of revenues. A deficit unprecedented in any country in peace times, of $3,000,000,000, confronts our Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932. We can not continue in this profligate course. I criticize the party in power for the extravagant appropriations which have been made and the enormous obligations which have been contracted. There must be economies introduced and reforms effectuated or the Government's financial condition will be disastrously affected.

Unfortunately the people are demanding larger appropriations from Congress, and I fear that we are yielding to improper demands, thus adding to the difficulties of the Government and, of course, augmenting the burdens which the taxpayers will be compelled to meet. It is apparent that governmental expenses are entirely too great; that too many bureaus and executive agencies and commissions have been created, and that the personnel of the Federal Government is entirely too large. There must be drastic cuts in Federal appropriations, and the executive departments must materially modify their policies and activities. The expenditures of the Government can not be justified, the executive departments have been extravagant and wasteful, and Congress has too readily responded to the demands for appropriations for projects and activities that can not be defended. As stated, the Finance Committee is attempting to discover sources from which revenue may be obtained in order to balance the Budget. Undoubtedly any bill which it reports will bear oppressively upon the people, but revenues must be obtained to meet legitimate expenditures and Congress must deny the demands of executive departments, and cut the Federal expenses at least $600,000,000 below the Budget recommendations of the President submitted in December last year. Appropriations for the Army and Navy for the next fiscal year should be reduced at least $150,000,000 below Budget estimates. There are many bureaus, commissions, and Federal agencies that should be abolished, including the Classification Board, and the adjustment of salaries upon a sound and fair basis should be effected. Federal expenses can be reduced five or six hundred million dollars with no disadvantage to the public service.

However, "organized minorities" stand in the way of these reforms. The President of the United States yesterday vigorously condemned the activities of these organizations. There are hundreds and, indeed, thousands of letters and telegrams daily received from Federal employees and various organizations protesting against plans that are being considered for the reduction of Government expenses and for the purpose of effecting reforms imperatively needed in executive departments. No one can justify the number of employees whose names appear upon the Federal rolls nor the expenditure of more than $1,200,000,000 to meet the salaries of Federal employees. There is much criticism of Federal bureaucracy, but apparently not sufficient courage to remedy the situation. Our attention has been called to the fact that the expenses of the Federal Government and the States and their political subdivisions for the present fiscal year will be between thirteen and and fifteen billion dollars. This is a burden that the people ought not to be compelled to bear. It is one which justifies them in compelling reforms in our governmental practices. The President in a recent address delivered at Richmond stated that 20 per cent of the entire earnings of the people of the United States will be consumed this fiscal year in meeting expenses of the National, State, and municipal governments. Twenty per cent of all the earnings of all the people of the United States taken from them by the strong arm of the law to meet governmental expenses can not be defended. A recent writer shows that the wealth of the United States to-day does not exceed $150,000,000,000.

In estimating the wealth, however, he does not include debts and obligation, but he considers the value of the buildings and the farms and the mines and the tangible things. As a matter of fact, the debts and obligations of the Federal, State, and municipal governments and corporations and individuals total nearly $150,000,000,000. Indeed, I have seen statements showing a larger indebtedness resting upon the American people; yet, in the face of these stupendous obligations which are obstacles to economic revival, the Senator from Maine and other Senators are now demanding an authorization to expend $1,000,000,000 before the end of 1936 for more war vessels. We are struggling now to find means to meet expenses; to provide for unemployment; to save banks, business enterprises, and the farmers; and yet a militaristic hand is laid upon us and a demand made for the immediate passage of the bill presented by the Senator from Maine. I warn Senators that sooner or later we will have a taxpayers' strike—a people's strike—against the exactions of Federal, State, and municipal governments and against the demands which are made for the support of our military system.

It is true, as the Senator from Maine has said, that this bill does not directly appropriate $1,000,000,000, but he knows, as all Senators know, that an authorization is promptly followed by an appropriation. Indeed, appropriation committees regard an authorization as a command to include in appropriation measures the amount authorized to be appropriated. Why does the Senator demand the passage of this bill unless he expects an appropriation for the construction of the war vessels provided for? This bill is not a gesture; it is not an idle statement—it is a solemn, specific authorization or requirement that the Appropriations Committees of the House and the Senate provide the amount called for in the bill.

The Senator from Maine is an advocate of a strong and powerful navy. I do not doubt his sincerity. He believes that the United States should have the most powerful navy in the world, and he frequently states that our Navy has so deteriorated that it now occupies a second or third place. He seems to fear an invasion; that our country is liable to be successfully attacked by some other country; and for years he has been urging larger appropriations for the Navy and stupendous sums for more naval craft. There is no emergency that requires the passage of this bill. It is fostered by navalists and agencies that are tainted with a form of militarism hostile to the Kellogg-Briand pact and in opposition to the efforts for disarmament and world peace.

Mr. President, the people are praying for work, for bread, for relief, not for larger appropriations for the Army and the Navy. They are not suffering from a military or naval complex; they are concerned in meeting their daily wants and in satisfying their hunger and in providing shelter for themselves and their families.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VANDENBERG in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. May I ask the Senator whether he has placed in the RECORD any figures indicating the cost of battleships to taxpayers?

Mr. KING. Constructed now or in the past?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Constructed at the present time.

Mr. KING. The United States has not laid down the keel of any capital ship since the limitation of arms conference in 1922, although it has expended large sums on the so-called "modernization" of most of our battleships. The cost of battleships has varied. My recollection is that the battleships projected under the 1916 program were to cost from forty to fifty million dollars each. There have been some battleships, including armament, that cost $50,000,000; and I recall that when there was discussion as to the cost of battleships or battle cruisers of a larger tonnage than those we now have, it was stated that the cost might be as much as $75,000,000. I have no doubt that a 35,000-ton battleship fully armed and equipped constructed to-day would cost approximately $50,000,000.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Is it not also true that the average cost of a battleship during the period of service through reconditioning and otherwise aggregates approximately $250,000,000?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it is difficult to answer the Senator's question. I do not know all the factors that he includes. Substantially all of our battleships have been materially changed since construction. Their guns have been elevated, their deck protection has been strengthened, and so-called "blisters or sheaths" have been added. Their engines have been overhauled, and numerous changes and modifications made at enormous cost. At the last session of Congress we appropriated $30,000,000 to provide, as I recall, for the elevation of the guns of three of our battleships. Not only is the cost of battleships very great, but the repairs, changes, and modifications require stupendous appropriations. The cost of maintaining our navy yards is a heavy burden. Docks have to be prepared and the cost of their construction and maintenance is no small item. The cost of furnishing oil for our battleships is a large item. Then there are the officers and men employed upon the ships, some of which carry 2,000 officers and sailors. During the life of a battleship, taking into account the items referred to, the cost of a battleship would perhaps reach the figures indicated by the Senator.

In speaking of the life of battleships, the Senator will recall that at the London conference a year ago Premier MacDonald, Dino Grandi, and Premier Briand signified their desire to abolish battleships. They also expressed a wish to limit the tonnage, if no plan for their abolition was agreed upon, to 25,000 tons, the present limit being 35,000 tons, and to prolong the life of the ships to 25 years or more. Unfortunately our representatives refused to even consider these propositions. They seemed to be intent only upon discussing cruisers or submarines. The battleships were too sacred to be touched.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Some years ago it was stated rather dramatically, I do not know how accurately, but apparently on responsible authority, that the cost to taxpayers of firing a single shell from the higher-range guns of battleships is the equivalent of the cost to consumers of 20,000 loaves of bread. Has the Senator any figures with reference to such expenditures?

Mr. KING. I have not, but I recall seeing figures somewhat along the line indicated by the Senator, and I have no doubt that the cost of firing a single shot would be about $1,000, to say nothing of the antecedent expenses, which must be taken into account in determining the ultimate cost.

Mr. COSTIGAN. That is even true of the expense of practice shots?

Mr. KING. I think that is correct. The cost of constructing, maintaining and operating capital ships has increased since the day when Lord Fisher evolved the type which subsequently was followed by the United States and Germany. One need only compare the most powerful naval craft of 25 and 30 years ago with our capital ships of the West Virginia type to understand the reason for the enormous increase in cost of construction and operation.

I referred a few moments ago to the treaty of Versailles, which declares that the disarmament of Germany was exacted "in order to render possible the initiation of a general limitation of the armaments of all nations." While the United States did not ratify the Versailles treaty, nevertheless the President of the United States was active in having incorporated therein provisions calling for a reduction in armament, with a view to the ultimate settlement of all controversies by peaceable means rather than by the sword. The treaty declares that—

> The requirements in regard to German armaments were not made solely with the object of rendering it impossible for Germany to resume her policy of military aggression. They are also the first steps toward that general reduction and limitation which they seek to bring about as one of the most fruitful preventives of war, and which it will be one of the first duties of the League of Nations to promote.

The covenant of the league provided that plans should be drawn for the reduction of armaments, as it was recognized that "the maintenance of peace requires the reduction of national armaments." Notwithstanding these solemn declarations and the mountain of debt piled upon the nations as the result of the war, we still find our Government appropriating between $700,000,000 and $800,000,000 annually for the ordinary expenses of the Army and Navy, and the measure now before us calls for, as I have indicated, a billion dollars additional.

General Pershing has stated in substance that the lessons of the war should convince anybody of the danger of nations "striding up and down the earth armed to the teeth," and he adds:

Isn't it, then, time for an awakening among enlightened peoples to the end that the leading powers may reach some rational agreement which would not only relieve the world of this terrible financial load but which in itself would be a long step toward the prevention of war?

Mr. President, the address delivered by President Hoover on the 4th of last May before the International Chamber of Commerce met with universal approval. He there stated:

Vast armament continues not only a burden upon the economic recuperation of the world, but, of even more consequence, the constant threats and fears which arise from it are a serious contribution to all forms of instability, whether social, political, or economic.

I commend these words of the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy to the Senator from Maine, as well as to the militarists in the United States. The President in the same address said:

* * * The destruction of life and property, the great tax burdens, and the social and political instability which resulted from the Great War have had large responsibility in the origins of the present depression. * * * Of all proposals for the economic rehabilitation of the world, I know of none which compares in necessity or importance with the successful result of that conference. * * *

It is not inopportune, Mr. President, to call attention to the armaments truce which was accepted by 56 nations, including all the great powers. This truce went into effect November 16, 1931, and was to continue for one year from that date. Upon a former occasion I invited the attention of the Senate to the terms of this truce, but I think it is so important, and so pertinent to the matter under discussion, that I again bring it to the Senate's attention. It is declared in this document to which the United States assented that there is a crisis which creates a profound disturbance among the nations of the world, in part due to the lack of mutual confidence, "and that a renewal of the competition in armaments would necessarily lead to an international and social catastrophe."

I should have added that the truce originated with the Assembly of the League of Nations. Following the preamble the assembly address a solemn appeal to all those who are desirous that practical effect should be given to the principles of peace and justice upon which the covenant is based and urge—

Them to devote all their efforts toward creating a world opinion strong enough to enable the general disarmament conference to achieve positive results, including in particular a gradual reduction of armaments, to be continued until such time as the object laid down in article 8 of the covenant is attained.

The address further states that an undertaking on the part of all States—

Not to increase their armaments would help to create an atmosphere of confidence, to prevent competition in armaments, and to prepare the ground for the success of the forthcoming conference.

A request was made that the governments invited to the disarmament conference should prepare for the event by means of an armaments truce. Accordingly the council was requested to urge the—

Governments to give proof of their earnest desire for the successful issue of the efforts to insure and organize peace—

* * * to refrain from any measure involving an increase in their armaments and to ask the Governments to state, before November 1, 1931, whether they are prepared for a period of one year from that date to accept this truce in armaments.

I insist that the spirit and, indeed, the letter of this truce, if the bill urged by the Senator from Maine becomes a law, will be violated by our Government. Certainly this important agreement contemplated that nothing should be done by those who were signatories to the same that would "involve an increase in armaments." Does not this bill involve an increase in armaments? Does it not mean a renewal of the "competition in armaments," for the prevention of which for a period of one year the truce was intended? One of the purposes of the truce was to afford one year at least to "organize the nations for peace" and to prepare them for disarmament. I repeat, Mr. President, that this bill is equivalent to a contemptuous disregard of the truce and ought to be defeated.

Mr. President, apropos the statements of President Hoover, I invite attention to the action of the National Grange at its national convention held at Madison, Wis., last November. It demanded:

* * * A drastic reduction in land, naval, and air armaments and progressive reductions of military budgets until all armies of the world are reduced to the status of police forces.

I might add that its committee on foreign relations reaffirmed its support of adherence to the World Court, with proper reservations, and urged the grange as an organization to do everything possible to further the success of the 1932 disarmament conference.

The National Farmers' Union, at its convention in Des Moines, Iowa, during the same month, declared—* * * that the present world depression makes immediate cut in armament expenditures imperative to lessen the disastrous tax burdens.

It also urged—

* * * the actual reduction of all armaments on land, sea, and air, with reduction and limitation of armament expenditure and the establishment of a permanent disarmament commission.

It also declared that the United States would have a decisive influence on the approaching world conference. I hope that this may be true.

I am told that at a Rotary international convention held in Vienna in June of last year 67 countries were represented, and that a resolution was adopted in which it was declared that—

The maintenance of armaments at their present level was viewed with profound disquiet and as an ultimate threat to the peace of the world and to the incitement to war.

It was further resolved that every possible step should be taken to insure that the disarmament conference now in session—

Shall succeed in bringing about a really substantial reduction in the armaments of the world.

There are accumulating evidences that the desire for disarmaments and world peace is universal, and that the intellectuals, so called, are conspicuous in their demands for world disarmament.

I recall that the Under Secretary of State, Mr. Castle, in an address delivered at Indianapolis, Ind., several months ago, declared—

* * * That the nations are beginning more clearly to realize that war to-day means defeat for all participants. It means defeat, because it means sooner or later a world-wide economic depression such as we have at the present time. * * *

It seems madness for the world to regard war as inevitable and as a part of national and international policies. As peoples and nations march toward the summit of civilization, law and order supersede force, violence, and war. Municipal law prevails among civilized nations, and courts and instrumentalities of peace settle controversies between individuals and communities. The peoples of the world, by reason of modern developments, are neighbors. Invisible boundary lines mark the jurisdiction and the limits of nations, but they do not prove a barrier to friendly cooperation between their respective inhabitants. Jurists of international fame are engaged in the codification of international law and in adapting it to civilized peoples. The great work of Grotius is being added to, and it is inevitable that a just and humane international jurisprudence will obtain throughout the world.

The deplorable economic conditions prevailing in this and other countries supply irrefutable arguments in favor of intergovernmental cooperation and world fellowship. If billions of dollars are annually appropriated for preparations for war, it is obvious that the return of prosperity will be indefinitely postponed. The burdens of militarism hang like a millstone around this and other nations, and the labors of the people are largely devoted to meeting the present military expenditures and the burdens which war have entailed upon them. Various estimates have been made by publicists and economists as to the world indebtedness. By some it is estimated to be several hundred billions of dollars. I have seen many statements to the effect that the World War cost more than $200,000,000,000; but the costs of the World War have not yet been paid, and generations will pass before they are liquidated. Many years will elapse before the United States will have discharged the monetary obligations which will be imposed upon it. Within the next 50 years the United States will, in my opinion, be called upon to pay $100,000,000,000 on account of the World War. Already approximately $6,330,000,000 have been appropriated for ex-service men, and there are manifold evidences that larger annual appropriations will be made in the future until, as I have indicated, the stupendous sum of $100,000,000,000 will have been expended to meet pensions, compensation, hospitalization, and so forth, as a result of our military adventure into the World War.

Between 1788 and 1929 the cost to the United States of wars and the war system was approximately $65,000,000,000. There are figures indicating that there have been expended by our Government in consequence of the World War up to June 30, 1930, more than $38,000,000,000. This does not include, of course, indirect costs, the aggregate of which it is almost impossible to determine. A very large part of our annual Budget is the result of past wars and of military preparations for the present and the future.

Military expenses have materially increased since the World War, and between 1858 and 1914 there was a large increase in the military expenses of the world. The total expenditure of Great Britain for military purposes in 1858 was $110,000,000; and in 1913, $385,000,000. Military expenses of the United States in 1858 amounted to but $39,000,000, and in 1913 they were $335,000,000. Between the dates referred to France increased her expenditures for like purposes from $35,000,000 to $410,000,000, Germany from $25,000,000 to $500,000,000, and Russia from $95,000,000 to $460,000,000.

The claim is now made by many that the military expenditures of all nations approximate $5,000,000,000 per annum, a sum vastly in excess of the expenditures for defense prior to the World War. The great powers expended five times as much on armaments in 1913 as they did in 1858. But, notwithstanding these enormous outlays, peace did not come to the world. As one nation increased its expenditures, ostensibly for defense, other nations felt compelled to augment their expenditures, all in the name of "national defense." The contention that the maintenance of large armies and navies for national defense prevents war is refuted by the history of all nations. Military preparations, the building of war vessels, and the mobilizing of land forces have always aroused distrust and fears which culminated in wars.

If nations desire peace, their objective will not be attained by imposing heavy burdens upon the people for so-called military preparedness. ePace will not be secured by preparations for war; and if the United States desires to promote the cause of peace, it can furnish convincing proof which will influence the world by limiting appropriations for military purposes and exerting its influence with other nations to bring about disarmament and to give to the Kellogg-Briand pact a vitality of which it will be deprived if this and other countries, ignoring the letter and spirit of that solemn declaration, devote so large a portion of their revenues for the building of naval vessels and the arming of land forces.

The United States in 1914 expended less than $340,000,000 for the Army and Navy. In 1929 we appropriated nearly $467,000,000 for the War Department and nearly $395,000,000 for the Navy Department, or a total of $861,525,675. For 1930 we appropriated more than $840,000,000 for the Army and Navy, and for 1931 my recollection is that the appropriation for these two departments was substantially the same. Great Britain appropriated in 1930 for military purposes $535,000,000. As Senators know, the responsibility rests upon Great Britain of protecting her far-flung dominions as well as the British Isles. The military budget of France for 1930 was $455,000,000, and Japan's military expenditures were $232,000,000.

It is obvious that the time has come for an international conference to adopt a concrete plan for the reduction of military burdens of the world. It is not too much to say that the eyes of all nations are turned to Geneva, as representatives of many nations are seeking to discover a formula which will be acceptable and result in material reductions in the military expenses of all nations. On the 29th of June, 1931, Premier MacDonald in the House of Commons delivered an important address upon the question of world disarmament. He called attention to the expenditures of a number of nations for military purposes before and since the World War. He stated that the naval expenses of Great Britain in 1914 were £51,500,000 and in 1930, £52,400,000; that the United States expended on its Navy in 1930, £78,000,000; and Japan in 1914 expended £8,500,000 on its navy, and in 1930, £26,000,000. He stated that in 1914 the British Commonwealth possessed 89 capital ships and to-day but 15; that the number of cruisers had been materially decreased since 1914, and its submarines were far less than they were in 1914. He made an appeal to other nations for a reduction in armaments, and said:

> The peace securities of Europe, we have believed, can be weakened by armaments, but there is a corollary to that, that unless the disarmament conference of next year is going to put an end to those expansions which have been so evident in the figures that I have quoted, a declaration is going to be made that disarmament is a failure and that nations are being doomed to tread the old ruts, which have always ended in battles, in ill will, and, cynically, above everything, in a treaty of peace that demands war and war in order to strengthen it. * * *

If we are to believe the statement of this distinguished statesman, we must look with deep concern upon the work of the Geneva conference. If it should fail, it would be a catastrophe the consequences of which can not be foreseen. We all know, however, that unless the nations of the world come together with a desire for peace, with a determination to reduce armaments, and carry into execution that will, by the adoption of a concrete plan, the world will be asking for further exactions for military purposes, the consequences of which will be to bring nearer to the peoples of the world the horrors and devastations of war. It seems incredible that with the exhausted condition of the world, with millions of men out of employment, with tens of millions without sufficient nourishment, with poverty and despair invading every land and entering millions of homes, that men and women can look with indifference upon the work of the Geneva conference; yet in the face of this situation the Senator from Maine urges the passage of a bill authorizing $1,000,000,000 for naval war vessels. The Senate indicates its approval of the same and the voices of many citizens and powerful newspapers are raised in support of this measure. In every part of our land there should be gatherings of patriotic American citizens demanding that the Kellogg-Briand pact shall not be disregarded and that our Government shall employ every honorable means to crown with success the conference now being held at Geneva. The toilers of the world should unite in an irresistible demand that the Geneva conference shall not fail but shall agree upon a plan that will accomplish the desired result.

I confess to keen disappointment at the reports which come from the conference. The able Senator from Idaho yesterday stated that it was already a failure. I may say that I am not satisfied with the part played by the American delegates. It seems to me that the voices of admirals and military men have been too powerful; that there have been too much fencing and equivocation and striving for advantage. There has been lacking that generous spirit that should characterize a conference, perhaps more important than any that has ever been convened for the consideration of measures promotive of international peace. The conference has been dominated by so-called experts, by admirals, and men who have devoted their lives to the study of war and the military problems that war presents.

The chances of a successful issue at the conference would be increased if all experts were dismissed.

Let me quote again from the address of Mr. MacDonald:

> The pact of Paris, for instance, eliminates war from our diplomacy. It does not seem to eliminate arms. I am sure that is only an oversight; and when the logical and practical discrepancy is pointed out effectively, the oversight will be admitted by everybody. But still we have to keep our eye upon the oversight. There are certain great forces that we are up against. There is a self-regarding nationalism expressing its nationalist spirit in an exclusive economic policy. There is the nature of peace and there is the problem, the most difficult and intricate of all problems, how you are to readjust not by force, not by wile, not by guile of any kind whatever, but by just allowing ordinary natural processes—I know that word is a very indefinite one, but the handling must also be indefinite—how we are to enable a readjustment of a continent settled by force to be made into one settled and enjoying natural relationships. That is one of the most difficult, intricate, and dangerous problems that any generation can have to face. The transition is bound to be marked by apprehension; and when movements are made of the most simple common sense, they are bound to arouse fears.

He further added that he hoped that an agreement would result from the conference that would strengthen and increase the political security of the world and result in a "complete agreement and most friendly relations between all the nations of the world."

Ex-Prime Minister Stanley Baldwin followed the Prime Minister and heartily approved his statements. Speaking of France, he said:

> I think that where people make a great mistake is in the psychology of the French people. I think, if I read it aright, I would say that to-day and for many years past the French people as a people are as peace loving and domestic a people as exists in Europe to-day.

He then referred to the Napoleonic wars which "bled white the nation." He referred to the League of Nations and stated—

> It is the one medium to-day which brings together the public men, the responsible public men, in the countries of Europe and of the world, and everything that brings them together and gets them into the habit of discussing instead of into the habit of shooting notes at each other through their respective foreign offices is all to the good.

We all realize, of course, that the French thesis is that for the want of an adequate organization of the world for the security of nations, particularly France, alliances are necessary for our protection. France favored the treaty of mutual guaranties and the Geneva protocol in 1924, but they have not become effective. Great Britain, notwithstanding her world-wide possessions, might be said to head the disarmament school and, while recognizing that there is much merit in the security thesis of France, contends that good will among nations is perhaps more important. Great Britain and other nations contend that great armaments foster the feeling of insecurity and are provocative of war. But I think all schools support the view that the expectation of war breeds arms and arms breed war.

Mr. President, within a few days there will be submitted for our consideration two measures carrying in the aggregate more than $700,000,000 for the ordinary expenses of our military and naval forces for the coming fiscal year. Measures of this kind calling for an amount so stupendous can not be otherwise than disquieting throughout the world. No nation in the world presents as large a budget for military purposes as that submitted by the executive department of our Government. France, which is charged by many as being militaristic, will have a military and naval budget more than $200,000,000 less than that which Congress will be asked to approve. In my opinion, we will appropriate for the next fiscal year at least $200,000,000 more for the Army and the Navy than will be appropriated by any nation on earth. I submit there is no justification for a military budget of such enormous proportions. I have heretofore said in discussing appropriation bills that the United States was the most powerful Nation in the world, that no nation could or would attack it, and that if it continued these large military expenditures other nations would become apprehensive and feel constrained to adopt naval and military policies which otherwise would not receive their approval.

It seems to me that some people are still under the spell of war. The smoke of battle is still in their eyes and they refuse to perceive that a new day has dawned and that men everywhere are struggling to emancipate themselves from reactionary chains, and to attain higher levels where they may breathe the pure air of peace and enjoy a broader and truer vision of the purposes and objects of life and the forces that should govern in the affairs of men and nations.

There is in Europe an elevated spot where three countries meet. Looking from this elevation one can see far in the distance, hills and valleys over which and in which mighty armies struggled and brave men fought and died. May this Nation and other countries meet, if not physically, in spirit and thought, and from an exalted point perceive the struggling and heavy-laden peoples of the world who are seeking to gain the uplands where they hope justice and peace may reign.

I referred a moment ago to the Geneva conference and to the statement of the Senator from Idaho that it had already failed. Mr. President, I shall be guilty of repetition when I say that if it should fail it would be because of military and reactionary forces, and such failure would be a setback to the liberal, progressive, and moral forces that are marching forward to conquer the world. We remember that petitions signed by millions of people were presented at the opening of the Geneva conference, in which hopes and prayers were expressed for its success. Shall these prayers and petitions be in vain? I fear that our delegates have not taken the position of leadership which the situation demands. The press reports that one of our distinguished delegates, while urging the abolition of submarines, expressed violent opposition to the suggestion that battleships be abolished. It has been reported that our delegates spent much time talking about poison gases and tanks and matters not of the highest importance. I confess that the reports brought to us afford the Senator from Idaho grounds upon which to base the conclusion which he expressed. If the conference fails, I fear that our Government will not be free from responsibility for such failure.

Senators will remember that at the ill-fated London conference our Government refused to even discuss the question of submarines or capital ships. Upon several occasions during the London naval conference Great Britain indicated its desire to consider the question of eliminating battleships from the fleets of the world. In an address which I delivered in the Senate a year ago when the naval bill was under consideration, I charged that our Government had interposed obstacles to the success of the conference. I showed that MacDonald, for Great Britain, and Grandi, speaking for Italy, and representatives of France had signified their desire to take up for consideration the capital-ship problem. Japan, while not taking an active position, indicated that she was not averse to a consideration of this question. But our representatives, acting, of course, under the direction of the President and the State Department, declined to meet the representatives of other countries for a discussion of submarines and capital ships. Our naval officers and so-called naval strategists and experts have tenaciously clung to the capital ship and refuse to consider any proposition looking toward its reduction in size or its abolishment.

Admiral Sims has repeatedly declared that the development of submarines and torpedo boats and aircraft has reduced the importance of the capital ship as an offensive or defensive instrumentality. The views expressed by him are entertained by some of the leading naval authorities of Great Britain. Sir Herbert Richmond, a naval officer of distinction and ability, earnestly advocates the abolition of battleships of over 10,000 tons. Our Government, notwithstanding the declarations of responsible officers that in the reduction of armaments no nation could go farther than the United States, has refused to consider propositions submitted by other nations calling for a limitation in the size of battleships or a prolongation of their service or for their abolition.

Mr. President, it is not infrequently charged that the Italian Government has been an obstacle to disarmament and has been animated by a militaristic spirit. The position taken by Mussolini and M. Dino Grandi, the Italian representative at the London, as well as the Geneva conference, is at variance with these statements. At the second plenary meeting of the twelfth ordinary session of the assembly of the League of Nations, on September 8, 1931, Grandi stated, speaking for Italy, that:

* * * Disarmament and arbitration, the rejection of all solutions based on force, and the relative equalizing of the military strength of states at the lowest possible level—that is not just a theory or dogmatic assertion. It lies at the root of the system which the league covenant has evolved with a view to the reduction of armaments; it corresponds essentially to real and pressing demands. Indeed, there is no problem of security distinct from disarmament and arbitration. * * *

He referred to the period preceeding the war and later to the principle of conciliation and arbitration, the establishment of the The Hague Tribunal and treaties based on the same principle as against the policy of armaments, and then added:

When we look back on those tragic happenings, we can hardly be surprised that our nations, which have barely emerged from a war the consequence of which are still crippling them, should refuse to regard international justice as an adequate safeguard for the future.

Nor can we be surprised if the nations ask that international justice shall be safeguarded from the dangers attendant upon a policy of armaments. The covenant imposes upon us the duty of disarming, but the covenant does not possess the only claim to our consideration; there exist other claims, vaster still.

For the last 20 years Europe has been in a permanent state of unrest. Wars and revolutions have succeeded one another, the deaths must be reckoned in millions, national systems of economy have been overturned, and the working classes are without employment.

Our civilization has been periodically saved in different directions by the genius of a few men, and by the power of resistance and the spirit of sacrifice of the peoples, but the time has come to make a collective and concrete effort in the defense of our common heritage.

We have had further proof during the last few months of the need for closer cooperation between nations, and—what is more important—there has been cooperation between the nations which only a short time ago were in armed conflict with one another. They have settled their differences and decided to cooperate in the defense of our common civilization.

Fresh possibilities have been opened up by the negotiations between those countries, which do not differ in any respect from those envisaged by the league. All these means lead to the same common goal. In any case, work is being done, ideas are being clarified and—let us be frank—the interests served by international solidarity are being proclaimed and defined. Our business now is to organize, to safeguard and to clear the way, and that we can not do so long as our efforts at collective organization are paralyzed by the race for armaments.

He then gives utterance to this important declaration:

In my government's view, disarmament is the starting point of many things; the putting into execution of the system of security and peace created by the covenant, the establishment of greater confidence between States, and the reestablishment of laws of economic integration which have suffered such ruthless violation.

That is the most urgent item in the league's program; that is the task most closely in keeping with the league's essential purpose.

The disarmament conference has been convened and will begin work on February 2. My observations may therefore appear superfluous; indeed, I hope that they will prove so. Naturally, they do not refer to the convening of the conference, but to the policy that may be adopted by the governments represented there, to the ideas they may bring to it, and to the methods they intend to follow. Now is the time for courage, moderation, and above all, common sense. Each one of us must realize the difficulties of the others, must state his own requirements frankly, limiting them to what is really essential, and must reduce his armaments to the lowest point consistent with national safety and the enforcement by common action of international obligations, within the meaning of article 8 of the covenant. * * *

In contrast with the reported position of our delegates to the Geneva conference I desire to call Senators' attention to statements made by a number of delegates representing other nations at the Geneva conference. I read from a publication known as Völkerbund, a journal of German League of Nations Union, under date of February 19, 1932. It contains statements made by a number of the delegates at the conference.

Again M. Dino Grandi, representing Italy, submitted an advanced program, one which, if adopted, will crown the conference with success. He said:

* * * My country for its part is therefore ready to accept an organic plan of quantitative limitations comprising:

In respect of naval armaments:

1. The simultaneous abolition of capital ships and submarines.
2. The abolition of aircraft carriers.

In respect of land armaments:

1. The abolition of heavy artillery of all kinds.
2. The abolition of tanks of all kinds.

In respect of air armaments:

1. The abolition of bombing aircraft.

In general:

1. The abolition of all kinds of aggressive means of chemical and bacteriological warfare.
2. The revision of the laws of war so as to insure a more complete and effective protection of civilian populations.

I do not think it necessary to draw your attention to the fact that when once we have come to an agreement for the abolition of certain weapons of war which are the most powerful and the most deadly, we should not only have taken a great step forward in the direction of disarmament, but we should also be in a position to come more easily and more rapidly to an agreement on the quantitative reduction and limitation of other forms of armaments. * * *

Senators will observe that Italy's program included the abolition of capital ships and submarines as well as aircraft carriers. I regret that our delegates did not support this view.

* * * There is a common idea at the basis of peace treaties, and of which the covenant of the League of Nations affords a practical example of what disarmament should be in the spirit of the League of Nations and of the pact of Paris for the renunciation of war.

Those who desire disarmament look with extreme gratification upon this broad and comprehensive view of the Italian representative. It is regretted that our delegates did not challenge attention to the pact of Paris, which called for the renunciation of war and which contemplated as a step necessary to the realization of the purpose of the Kellogg-Briand pact the reduction of armaments to the lowest possible limit and the ultimate disarmament of all nations. He also added:

* * * We have more than once debated the theoretic question whether disarmament should precede security or security disarmament. We have discussed it for the past 10 years; and should we continue the debate during the whole course of our labors, we should inevitably engage in the path described as that of the sophistry of disarmament.

Let us then leave theories on one side and look facts in the face. The facts show that without disarmament there can be no security. Since the close of the war and since we undertook for the first time in a definite way to reduce armaments, armaments have been steadily increasing. To-day all countries are carrying a burden of military expenditures more crushing than that they had to bear immediately before the war. We are, I fear, on the slope leading to a new armaments race at the very time when we were elaborating legal instruments of security. * * *

Sir John Simon, speaking for Great Britain's delegation, declared in favor of a permanent disarmament commission, the abolition of gas and chemical warfare, and also the abolition of submarines. He also stated that his delegation was ready to cooperate in whatever methods are found most practicable for agreed reduction in the size of ships and of maximum gun caliber as well as in any practical application of the principle of prohibiting land guns above a certain caliber.

Japan was represented by distinguished delegates, among them M. Matsudaira, who, speaking for the delegation, said:

The Japanese delegation is in favor of adopting the draft convention as the foundation of the work of the conference.

It is in favor of reduction in the size of battleships and in the caliber of their guns. We would further propose the reduction in the assigned tonnage of the airplane carriers, since their functions would be of the most aggressive nature. We are prepared further to consider the possibility of their total abolition, together with the prohibition of equipping vessels with airplane-landing decks.

As to the proposals for the total abolition of the submarine, the view of Japan was clearly set forth at the time of the London conference. In short, it is this: That it is not so much in the original nature of the submarine to be inhuman as in its wanton use. A surface craft would be just as inhuman according to its use. As to the use of the submarine a strict limitation was stipulated in the London naval treaty. It is our hope that all naval powers would find it possible to adhere to that declaration, and it is our conviction that an agreement as to a strict similar limitation on the use of all classes of war vessels should be come to. We entirely share the view of the American delegation regarding the prohibition of air bombardment, the use of poison gases, and bacteriological warfare.

M. Zulueta, the Spanish delegate, stated:

* * * Efforts to palliate the evil by attempting to humanize war will prove useless. I am doubtful as to the desirability of the attempts made to proscribe those arms which are called inhuman. We are distracting the conference from its real object, which is not to mitigate but to abolish war. * * *

M. Litvinov, delegate from the Soviet Government, submitted a statement that in my opinion should receive most serious consideration. Senators will recall that at the preliminary conference held about two years ago, called for the purpose of preparing a program for the Geneva conference, M. Litvinov submitted several propositions, one of which called for complete disarmament of all nations. This proposition was treated with contempt by the delegates. He submitted several others which ought to have received consideration. The treatment accorded this representative of the Soviet Government aroused considerable criticism in Russia and was used as a foundation for a rather extensive propaganda against capitalistic nations, the contention being that they were insincere in their avowals of a desire for world disarmament and were intent upon maintaining military forces to be used against the Soviet Government. At the Geneva conference M. Litvinov, speaking for the Soviet Government, submitted the following program as a contribution of his Government to a policy of world disarmament:

* * * The only infallible way to the solution of the problem of the organization of peace, the problem of the averting of war, the problem of assuring security to all nations, is general and total disarmament.

The idea of total disarmament is distinguished from all other plans by its simplicity and by the ease with which it could be carried out and with which its realization could be controlled. Identical security and equality of conditions for all countries could only be arrived at by means of total disarmament. The Soviet delegation has by no means come here merely to put before you yet another time its proposal for total and general disarmament, or to declare that we are determined to have complete disarmament or none at all. We have no illusions whatsoever as to the fate in store for our proposition. Our delegation is ready to discuss with you any proposals tending to reduce armaments; and the further such reduction goes, the more readily will the Soviet delegation take part in the work of the conference. Considering the draft convention drawn up by the preparatory commission altogether inadequate, the Soviet delegation will advocate here its own draft for the reduction of armaments, which, however, it regards merely as the first step toward total disarmament.

I would remind the conference that the Soviet delegation was the first to propose, in its second draft convention put before the preparatory commission, the complete destruction of the most aggressive types of armaments, including:

1. Tanks and superheavy long-range artillery.
2. Ships of upward of 10,000 tons displacement.
3. Naval artillery of over 12-inch caliber.
4. Aircraft carriers.
5. Military dirigibles.
6. Heavy bombing planes, all stock of air bombs, and any other means of destruction for use from airplanes.
7. All means and apparatus for chemical, incendiary, and bacteriological warfare.

The Soviet delegation proposed the complete prohibition of air bombing and not only beyond the limits of a definite area. It also proposed not merely to refrain from chemical warfare but actually from preparing for it in time of peace.

All these proposals remain in full force for the present conference.

I am empowered to declare here the readiness of the Soviet Union to disarm to the same extent and at the same rate to which the other powers may agree.

The delegates from other nations submitted plans for disarmament, but none were as liberal and advanced as those presented by the soviet representative and by the representative of Italy.

I confess that the address of Ambassador Gibson was disappointing to me, and the attitude of our delegates since then has, I fear, deprived the United States of the leadership which it should have assumed.

Not long ago the Navy League, which is an effective propagandist for a big Navy and for battleships, criticized the President, charging him with "abysmal ignorance" because he did not accept the views of the league and of admirals and the Navy Board. Mr. President, if Mr. Hoover adheres to the letter and spirit of the address which he delivered before the International Chamber of Commerce in advocacy of a reduction of armaments, and if he will direct our delegates at the Geneva conference to support a real and effective policy for disarmament, he will receive the support of an overwhelming majority of the American people in that position.

Mr. President, there are not a few militarists in the United States who are constantly demanding increased appropriations for the Army and the Navy. They visit all parts of the United States and avail themselves of every opportunity to urge the people to support measures calling for increased appropriations. The people are told that our country is in danger of invasion; that it is unprepared to meet lurking foes ready to make war upon our country. It is unfortunate that the people are beguiled or influenced by these representations.

There are too many living in the military atmosphere of the nineteenth century; too many followers of the naval philosophy of Admiral Mahan, who asserted that general armament is the road to peace. He argued that an organization of military strength is not provocative of war, and that the powerful armaments of Europe, though onerous, were nevertheless beneficial, "because that created mutual respect and caution, which were the alternative to devastating wars."

I do not think that his philosophy finds vindication in the events that have transpired during this or preceding centuries. Who can doubt that the military forces, both land and naval, of European powers, particularly Germany, led to the World War? This view postulates the triumph of material forces in life over those of a moral and ethical character. It denies the unifying power of religion; the civilizing force of cultural development, and the results of the progressive and democratic forces which, more and more, are manifesting themselves throughout the world. It rests upon the doctrine of the status quo; it ignores the profound philosophy of Spencer which recognizes the operation of evolutionary elements in the social and political life of nations. The multilateral pact of Paris; the meeting together of scores of nations to formulate plans for the betterment and advancement of all peoples; the manifestation of a broader spirit of internationalism; all these manifestations prophetic of important changes that are taking place among the peoples of the earth are ignored by the materialistic philosophy which is accepted by many in this and other lands.

I referred a few moments ago to the proposition made by M. Litvinov at a meeting of the preliminary commission when his plan was rejected—a plan that called for the dissolution of land, sea, and air forces; the destruction of weapons, of military supplies, and means of chemical warfare; the discontinuance of compulsory military training; the destruction of fortresses and naval air bases; the scrapping of war industrial plants and the abolition of military and naval air ministries.

The statement made by the President in March, 1929, I am afraid is being forgotten by our representatives at the Geneva conference, and it is also overlooked by the State Department and the President. In his inaugural address President Hoover stated that—

Peace can be promoted by the limitation of arms and by the creation of the instrumentalities for the peaceful settlement of controversies. I covet for this administration a record of having further contributed to advance the cause of peace.

But our Government and the military and naval authorities are enamored of the word "parity" and seek to apply it to all categories. They are governed too much by rampant nationalism and seem to follow the view that to carry on war is not the sole raison d'être of big armies and navies. When challenged to name the government that is our enemy and contemplates making war upon us they insist that we must maintain a large Navy and military force because of the moral effect these armaments will have upon the world. In other words, they argue that a powerful military force will not only guard and protect our shores but will be a restraining influence upon other nations. This view postulates that the United States is a sort of world policeman and must stride throughout the world with club and gun in hand and awe smaller nations into a sullen submission. I am reminded of the statement of the Spanish writer and statesman Madariaga, who says:

> It is not so much actually in order to shoot her guns at England that America wants cruisers, nor to defend her supplies from American cruisers that England is so particular about her superiority at sea—it is because naval preeminence means international prestige, preponderance in the counsels of the world, authority in troubled areas such as China; power to have one's way, political backing to financial economic and commercial penetration.

Undoubtedly this view still prevails among many—that a nation to have prestige and to play a large part in the world must possess great military strength. Our Navy Department has at times, with evident pride, amounting almost to pompousness, referred to the operations and activities of the Navy in carrying captains of industries from port to port and promoting trade and commerce.

The United States and Great Britain many years ago entered into the Rush-Bagot treaty which resulted in the destruction of all fortifications and prevented either country from erecting forts and maintaining any weapons of war along a boundary line extending from ocean to ocean. One passes across an invisible boundary from Canada to the United States and vice versa, and both countries are relieved of military burdens in guarding this invisible line. Why may not other nations invoke the same spirit of amity and good will; and why may not all nations, under the benign influence of this vitalizing and inspiring force, devote their energies to industrial and economic development—to cultural and spiritual growth—rather than to dissipate their resources and their energy in devising and constructing instrumentalities of war, devastation, and destruction?

A number of years ago Chile and the Argentine Republic ended their military conflicts and entered into a treaty of peace and amity. To signalize this important and epochal event, and as a pledge that their relations in the future would be governed by a spirit of peace and good will, they erected upon the heights of the Andes a magnificent statue of the Man of Peace. They did not select a great military or naval hero to commemorate the event or to solemnize the treaty of amity by which they were to be governed in the future. They found in the Savior of Mankind the most perfect symbol and the most majestic figure of which mankind had knowledge. Their act was a solemn renunciation of war—a dedication to the policies of peace.

Mr. President, I repeat that the passage of the bill under consideration will arouse fears and apprehensions as to our good faith and our desire for peace. We may avow our devotion to the cause of peace; our determination to engage in no imperialistic or military policy, but our avowals will be discounted and will fall upon deaf ears. I recall the words of Chief Justice Hughes before the American Society of International Law in April, 1927. He was referring to the naval program of 1916, which called for 16 capital ships and corresponding auxiliary craft at a cost of nearly a billion and a half dollars. I might add by way of parenthesis that the attempt to force through this program aroused much opposition in the United States, which, in part, was responsible for the limitation of arms conference of 1922. The words of Judge Hughes were as follows:

> * * * Whatever the motive that inspired our naval program of 1916 it was clear, after the end of the war, that it was unnecessarily extensive and had become essentially provocative. * * * The question pressed, Against whom was it directed? Germany's naval power was destroyed. There were but two other great naval powers—Great Britain and Japan. It was natural for Japan to misinterpret the motives back of the continuance of our ambitious naval force. I am informed that, responsive to ours, Japan's naval expenditure, which was less than $100,000,000 in 1917, had been increased to over $270,000,000 in 1921.

It should have been obvious to the American people that a program of the character referred to would inspire fears and distrust in other countries. May we not look for the same reaction now that we are driving through a bill calling for $1,000,000,000 for naval craft?

Mr. Bywater, in his work on Sea Power in the Pacific, refers to a discussion in the Japanese Diet when it became known that the United States was driving forward the 1916 naval program.

In reply to members of the Diet, representatives of the Government stated that the naval program was not prepared until they had information concerning the naval program of two other countries, one of which, of course, was the United States. In other words, the Japanese Government revised its naval plan and budget to meet the naval policy of the United States.

Mr. President, what justification is there for this bill? And what excuse is there for the United States appropriating, as the administration proposes that it shall appropriate, more than $700,000,000 to meet the ordinary expenses of the Army and the Navy for the next fiscal year? Against whom are we arming; what foe do we fear; what nation is challenging us; what dangers confront us?

Mr. President, no one but a violent, unreasoning "bellofist" can have the temerity to name any nation which menaces our peace or contemplates invading our shores. The Latin American countries desire the friendship and good will of the United States. If they are alienated, it will be because of unwise policies pursued by this Republic. They acknowledge their indebtedness to the United States because of the protection accorded them, when, as revolting and struggling colonies, the Monroe doctrine was promulgated. They learned that the United States desired that they should have full opportunity for self-development and self-expression; that it had no imperialistic designs. When they established free and independent states they adopted, in part, some of the provisions of the fundamental laws of this Republic; they hoped to have a Pan American Union within which the fullest and freest opportunity for economic and political development might be realized. They desired that the channels of trade and commerce between their countries and the United States should not suffer from improper obstacles. The States of Latin America will be animated with a desire for friendly relation with the United States if this country pursues a wise and liberal policy, such as announced by Monroe and by American statesmen and leaders of public thought from his day until the present time.

When the United States entered the World War as a belligerent, substantially all Latin American governments cast their lot with this Republic. There is not a single American who will say that the United States has aught to fear from the people of Mexico or Central or South America. They are not building war vessels or constructing military machines; they desire peace and the good will of this and other nations.

On the Western Hemisphere we have no foe; within its boundaries there lurk no dangers to this Republic. Who dares say that Germany or France or Italy or any of the nations of Europe are projecting military or naval plans which have in view armed conflicts with this country. The smaller nations of Europe are practically disarmed. Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Holland have neither armies nor navies. Spain has thrown off a monarchial form of government and seeks to establish a liberal and progressive Republic. Do we fear Portugal, Switzerland, Poland, or the Baltic States?

No Senator nor any person familiar with conditions in Germany will contend that we should build battleships and organize military forces for fear of German aggression. The German people have tasted the horrors of war, and with courage are trying to meet the economic and industrial problems that press for solution. They want work, bread, and the opportunity for peaceful development—not war and international conflicts. Under the treaty of Versailles their military and naval forces are restricted; and even if there were no restrictions, the present situation in Germany will compel the German people to seek the economic and industrial rehabilitation of their fatherland. It is true they are dissatisfied with the terms of the Versailles treaty and will seek to modify the demands for reparations.

I have referred to the position taken by Italy at the Geneva conference and called attention to the plan for disarmament there suggested by M. Dino Grandi.

The Italian Government is giving many evidences of its pacific intentions and its desire to cooperate not only with European nations but with the civilized world in promoting trade and commerce and international peace and good will. It has been the habit of some Americans to indulge in violent criticism of Mussolini and to attribute to him and to the Italian people warlike designs and militaristic aspirations. Gestures have occasionally been made by Benito Mussolini, or some of the Fascist leaders, which were interpreted by some as indicative of an unfriendly attitude upon the part of the political and governmental authorities in Italy toward other countries, but I submit that the Italian Government and the Italian people seek an industrial renaissance. Certainly no one can claim that Italy presents any danger to the United States or that our military and naval budgets should be framed upon the theory that Italy is a menace to this Republic. The Italian people love their homes; they are largely devoted to agricultural pursuits and, as I have indicated, their chief concern is to bring economic recovery to their country.

Does the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] contend that the passage of this $1,000,000 authorization is called for because of conditions in France? He knows, as all Senators know, that France has a small navy and did not avail herself of the opportunity given under the disarmament treaty of 1922 of constructing battleships. I might add that Italy did not avail herself of the same permission. France is a nation of agriculturists and the great majority of her people own their own homes and cultivate their own land. There has been much criticism of France in this and other countries since the World War, but in my opinion she has been unjustly charged as being animated by a militaristic spirit.

A few moments ago I read from addresses delivered in June last by Premier Macdonald and Stanley Baldwin. Permit me to quote a few sentences from these addresses. Speaking of France, Premier Macdonald says:

* * * Here one may say that a country in the position of France is in a peculiarly attackable position in that respect. We are an island. Let us be fair. Let us be just. Fairness and justice do not consist merely of logic. We must be able to use our imagination, to make our fairness a full measure of fairness, and our justice a full measure of justice. These people have been invaded again and again and again; their fields have been flattened by the feet of millions of invading soldiers. No channel however thin that trickle may be in view of modern invention and the application of science and research, no channel but a line drawn upon the ground—that is their only frontier. What should we feel like if we were in that position? Anyone who goes over the border country between England and Scotland, especially if he has any imagination, can understand the modern conditions and the modern psychology of large sections of the people of Europe. Therefore while we give our figures and ask for our agreements and negotiate our agreements, do not let us lose that sympathetic touch which is bound to keep France and us together so long as we have the proper imagination to see what a Frenchman feels, and above all what a French woman feels, when war is talked about and disarmament is being negotiated. * * *

Stanley Baldwin in his address stated—

* * * I would say one word in addition to what the Prime Minister said about France. I am glad that he said what he did, because there is a tendency in many quarters to make France the scapegoat for every trouble that occurs in Europe. While I quite admit that there is often much to criticize in France, as in ourselves, I think that where people make a great mistake is in the psychology of the French people. I think, if I read it aright, I would say that to-day and for many years past the French people as a people are as peace-loving and domestic a people as exists in Europe to-day. But let us never forget that twice within 120 years the manhood of France has been bled white. The Napoleonic age crippled the manhood of France. Of the war of 1870, terrible as it was, I do not think I would use the term "bled white" as I do of the Napoleonic age and the recent war. What was the spirit that drove France into the Napoleonic wars? It was not so much that France was seized with imperialistic ideas, whatever may have been in Napoleon's mind. I always regard the spiritual impulse in the French people at that time as the impulse of 1789; it was the feeling that they were the apostles of this new liberty, equality, and fraternity, and they were going to upset all the thrones of Europe and to impose those doctrines upon Europe. One of the dangers, as I see it, of the situation at the other end of Europe at this moment is this: I ask myself, is there a danger of the spiritual ideal which animated France in those years animating Russia and driving her out from her boundaries as France was driven out at that time?

But however that may be, that was, in my view, the impulse which led the manhood of France to its death in those years. It was what so often has caused wars in history; it was a great clash of ideals. The clash took place in Europe, and wherever there is a clash of ideals the Englishman is found in it on one side or the other, and the Napoleonic wars took place with the result that we know. There came 1870 and there came the last war, and those last two years have so burnt into their very souls that the Prime Minister has spoken about. It is difficult for us to realize what it means to be a nation in a vast continent with nothing but it may be a river or a field as the boundary over against your neighbor. We are, of course, from a military point of view, not an island any more. It will be some time before our people realize that, but we have to get the continental mind with regard to the position of our own land, and those of us who have been able to get it can sympathize with France. It is an agricultural country in the main. She has seen her fields, her corn, and her vineyards trampled upon by her hereditary enemies and by the armies of her own Allies. That is an experience which men, women, and children can never forget.

Let us show France that sympathy that she needs and deserves, and, as the Prime Minister said, try to bring her along with us and to convince her that, difficult as the task to which we are all pledged may be, the difficulties and dangers of any other path are greater still.

Undoubtedly France is unwilling that the Versailles treaty should be "treated as a scrap of paper" and that new states such as Poland and Czechoslovakia should be destroyed. She has felt constrained to protect the terms of the treaty, because in so doing believed she was protecting her own territory from further invasions and Europe from another devastating war.

In my opinion the greatest peacemaker of Europe in modern times was the great Briand, whose recent death was an international calamity. He collaborated with Stresemann, Germany's great statesman, whose death was also a blow to world peace, in bringing into closer relationship Germany and France. He attempted to organize a United States of Europe, to remove racial prejudices, traditional animosities, and to make effective as an instrumentality of peace the League of Nations, the World Court, and the Kellogg-Briand pact. He and other statesmen of Europe perceived the importance, indeed the necessity, of the most friendly cooperation, politically and economically, between France and Germany.

As I have before stated, France over and over again has signified her willingness to abolish battleships and to adopt a naval policy that will lighten the heavy military burdens to which the nations are subjected.

Does anyone justify this bill and our naval program because of Russia's naval policies? There may be differences of opinion as to the ambitions and desires of the Soviet Government. I know that there are those who believe that Stalin and his associates are planning the destruction of all so-called capitalistic governments, and that if this can not be accomplished by propaganda and intrigue it will be attempted by force. That the Russian Navy is of inconsequential proportions all must admit.

It would be absurd to urge that our naval expenditures must be increased because of Russia's naval program. I spent several months in Russia a few years ago, and in my rather extensive travels there I obtained considerable information concerning the workings of the Soviet Government and the purposes and policies of the Russian people. Although the Russian Army numerically is perhaps larger than that of any other country except China, the Russian people are not communists. Perhaps the communists of Russia do not exceed in number two or three million, and they and the communist leaders are more concerned now in protecting the gains which they have made in their own country and in preventing the liquidation of the Soviet Government than they are in the formulation of plans for the invasion of other countries. From my association with the Russian people I am led to believe that Litinov's proposition for disarmament on land and sea and air was submitted in good faith. The deplorable economic condition of Russia would not permit the Bolshevik Government to engage in military operations even if it were disposed to enter upon such enterprise. Recently Russia entered into a number of treaties with European nations, and with Turkey and Persia, providing for nonaggression, and for a recognition of the territorial boundaries of such countries. Finland, Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania, all bordering upon Russia, so far as I am advised, are not contemplating military conflicts with the Soviet Government. I concede, however, that the communist leaders in Russia believe that communism is destined to conquer the world and that sooner or later bourgeois systems and capitalistic governments will give way to the Marxian philosophy as it is interpreted and applied by the communists of Russia; and it is perhaps true that fanatical and zealous communists believe that the day is not far distant when, unless capitalistic nations accept the philosophy of communism, there will be revolutions within such countries and that the Soviet Government will be in a position to afford aid to such movements. But I submit that the bill before us can not be defended by reason of conditions in Russia or of fears of Russian assaults upon our Government. It would appear, therefore, that by a policy of elimination there are only two countries that we may take into consideration in formulating a naval policy; namely, Great Britain and Japan.

Mr. President, I have called attention to statements made by Sir John Simon and Ramsay MacDonald with respect to the question of disarmament. Certainly Great Britain has shown a disposition of going further in world disarmament than have our representatives at the London or Geneva conferences. I can not conceive of the United States fashioning its military policies upon the theory that war between these two great democracies is probable. It is inconceivable that in this enlightened age there should be war between the English-speaking peoples of the world. The United States and Great Britain are bound together by invisible ties. Senators know that from Great Britain came our jurisprudence, our Bill of Rights, our language, and much of our philosophy, a rich literary inheritance, a love of liberty and freedom that animates and inspires all who live under the Stars and Stripes. It would be impossible for Great Britain, even if a complete transformation should take place in the hearts and minds of the British people, to engage in a military conflict with the United States. The geographical position of the United States makes this Republic invulnerable to attack. Great naval commanders like Admiral Sims have declared that a naval war could not successfully be carried on against a far-distant country. No naval forces that Great Britain or any or all countries combined could bring together could successfully attack the United States. The Commonwealths of Great Britain are bound together by the most tenuous cords; indeed, they are, to all intents and purposes, independent states. Notwithstanding the ties of affinity and consanguinity between Great Britain and some of the British Commonwealths, material interests may become controlling factors in determining the relations between them and the mother country.

If Great Britain were the aggressor in a military conflict with the United States, who can say that Canada, Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, or India would give material or moral support to the British Government? If these great Commonwealths were to engage in combat, the world would be involved in gloom, if not in darkness.

Mr. President, for a number of years there has been a chauvinistic element in our country that has sought to arouse public sentiment against Japan, and the recent occurrences in the Orient have revived the jingo spirit that materially subsided after the World War. Many overlook the fact that in that contest Japan gave material aid to the allied and associated powers. Japan participated in the limitation of arms congress and accepted the restrictions prescribed in the treaty following the conference. Japan's position for many years has been most difficult. She has a growing population—a restricted territorial area and limited resources. The problem confronting her has been and is to provide food for her inhabitants. Legislation excluding Japan from a number of countries has been enacted, and the limited area of Japan has brought the matter forcibly before the people that their future was uncertain unless an outlet for her surplus population could be discovered. Japan, like Great Britain, is unable to produce sufficient food for her population, and is compelled to look to the mainland for food and for raw materials.

It was to be expected that Japan, because of her insular position and lack of food supplies and raw materials, would look with concern upon the policies of other countries which would affect the mainland and particularly that portion of China and Manchuria which were separated from Japan by narrow stretches of water only. From the days of Peter the Great to the organization of the Soviet Government, Russia pushed her conquests eastward to the Pacific Ocean. Not content with her enormous territorial gains, the Russian Government invaded Manchuria and evidenced a purpose to confine Japan to her narrow and restricted limits. Japan in self-defense met the Russian armies and defeated them both upon land and upon sea. Japan won important victories and proved the character, courage, and devotion of her forces. History, I think, will show that Japan was largely deprived of the fruits of victory through the intervention of the great powers, but it is not inaccurate to say that Japan's emergence from a medieval status was the result of her contacts with occidental nations.

Recently, a distinguished Japanese, in an address delivered in New York, replied to critics who condemned his country and his people as having military ambitions and warlike characteristics. He stated in substance that before American war vessels entered Japanese ports and an American commodore demanded that they should be open to the commerce of the world, the Japanese were a quiet, inoffensive, and peace-loving people. He stated that they loved their mountains and their valleys and lived among their flowers, and many devoted their time to literary pursuits and to artistic activities. He further stated that so long as Japan remained in that rather pastoral and primitive condition she was treated with condescension by the occidental nations, but that when she followed the ways of Christian nations and built war vessels and raised and maintained well-drilled and efficient military forces, the Christian nations of the world were willing to receive her into their circle, and Great Britain sought an alliance which was only superseded when a treaty was entered into at the limitation of arms conference in 1922 between the powers, including the United States, and Japan.

The speaker was not defending militarism but was answering what he conceived to be unjust attacks upon his country and misinterpretation of the purposes and desires of the Japanese people.

Mr. President, I hold no brief for Japan, and I think her recent activities in and about Shanghai will be difficult to explain to the world. Undoubtedly the chaotic condition in China has occasioned deep concern upon the part of the Japanese Government. Japan could not look complacently upon China, torn and dissevered and a prey to predatory forces and communistic depredations. I do not believe that Japan seeks political control over China or aims to exclude occidental nations from trade with China. The policy of the open door, I think, Japan hopes to see maintained. It is quite likely, however, that with respect to Manchuria Japan believes that she has peculiar or special interests that may not be disregarded. The Soviet Government exercises more or less of authority over Mongolia. Japan may not feel quite assured that sooner or later there may not be a recrudescence of Russian imperialism which may lead the Russian Government, no matter its form, to covet Manchuria.

The United States has insisted upon maintaining the Monroe doctrine and various interpretations have been placed upon it by succeeding administrations. President Coolidge so interpreted it as to give the United States peculiar interests in certain Central American states. May not Japan contend that morally and legally she has interests different and distinct from those of other nations in Manchuria? Japan has large investments in Manchuria and more than a million of Koreans and Japanese have homes and property interests there. For several years last past bandits and brigands have infested that country and subjected Chinese, as well as Koreans and Japanese, to indignities and inhuman treatment. Doubtless Japan believed she had a right to defend her railroad and other interests, as well as the Koreans and Japanese, who were materially contributing to the establishment of peace and order and adding to the wealth of Manchuria.

I am not justifying Japan in the course which she has pursued; I am merely calling attention to a number of facts familiar to Senators. In what I have said I do not forget the tragic conditions in China and the efforts which are being made in China by patriotic Chinese to protect their country and to develop a national spirit and to resist every and all encroachments upon the territorial integrity or political rights of China. However, I will not pursue this thought further. I have alluded to these matters only because the contention is not infrequently made that the United States must maintain a powerful Navy because of Japan's alleged aggressive and ambitious projects. In my opinion, we are not justified in assuming that Japan is our enemy and fashions her military and naval plans with reference to the United States. At the London conference, as well as the conference now in session at Geneva, the representatives of Japan have indicated a willingness to materially reduce the military armaments of their country and to join other nations in relieving the people of the frightful military burdens resting upon them.

Mr. President, I return to the question, What justification is there for this proposed legislation? I quoted a statement of the Senator from Maine that—

> * * * The enactment of this bill into law will have a stabilizing effect on world affairs. * * *

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, is it the contention of the Senator from Utah that the enactment of the pending bill would stimulate the spirit of competitive arming?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I can reach no other conclusion, nor can I comprehend how any other conclusion can be reached.

Italy has recently announced that she has abandoned for the present the construction of one or more naval vessels which under existing treaties she is not deterred from building. Great Britain on the 3d of March reduced her military budget over $18,000,000. Her naval estimates were lowered, and the average personnel of the navy was decreased 2,300 men. In what manner the passage of this measure calling for $1,000,000,000 to be expended for naval vessels within four years will have a "stabilizing effect on world affairs" the Senator from Maine did not satisfactorily explain. In what manner will it "stabilize world affairs"? Evidently the Senator believes that it is a threat that the United States intends to strengthen its Navy; that because of the greater resources of the United States it can expend larger sums than other nations for military purposes; and that $1,000,000,000 for new war vessels, to be built within four years, involves no serious drain upon the Treasury of the United States or the financial resources of the United States.

Mr. President, I believe that the passage of this bill will, as I have heretofore stated, arouse fears, if not resentments, upon the part of the nations whose representatives are now meeting delegates from the United States. When Germany began the construction of a powerful navy it did not tend to stabilize world affairs, but, on the contrary, produced instability, aroused fears and apprehensions, and, indeed, animosities. Does the Senator think that it will increase our bargaining power at the Geneva conference, and that those participating in the conference in order to obtain our favor will more quickly accept terms which our delegates may submit? Mr. President, I am sure that the suggestion of this view will prove offensive not only to the representatives of other nations attending the conference but to the people generally who are longing for disarmament and for peace.

The Senator from Maine would have the country believe that our Navy has so deteriorated that it deprives our country of proper protection. The fact is, Mr. President, that we have the strongest and most powerful Navy in the world. I have before me a statement prepared by our Secretary of State, addressed to the secretary-general of the League of Nations, dated June 6, 1931. Preliminary to the Geneva conference the participating nations were requested to submit to the secretary-general of the league a detailed statement showing the military forces of each nation. In response to this request the Secretary of State submitted a statement and tables, covering 18 pages of printed matter, which contain complete information regarding the land, naval, and air effectives and air matériel "of the United States Government, as well as information regarding the expenditures for the armed forces of our Government." This report shows that the global tonnage of our Navy is 1,251,840 tons. The capital-ship tonnage totals 523,800. The tonnage of the aircraft carriers totals 95,300 tons. Cruisers with guns of more than 6.1 inch 155 millimeters built, building, appropriated for, or authorized total 206,800 tons. Cruisers with guns of 6.1 inch and less 155 millimeters total 75,900 tons. The number of destroyers is 256, with a total tonnage of 273,360 tons. Our Navy contains 110 submarines with a total tonnage of 80,680. I should add that some of the destroyers are over 16 years of age, and some of the submarines are over 13 years of age and are listed for disposal. There are also various other naval vessels, such as mine sweepers, Eagle boats, submarine chasers, tenders, aircraft tenders, cargo ships and transports, and so forth, numbering 197, having 776,085 tons.

The report also lists a number of special vessels, such as mine layers, monitors, and so forth, numbering 14, with a total tonnage of 88,050 tons. Under the head of Air Materiél the report shows that we have 1,752 airplanes having a total horsepower of 1,028,745. In addition there are dirigibles and other naval accessories. The report further states that the expenditures of the United States on shipbuilding for the year ending June 30, 1930, was approximately $37,000,000, and that the cost of maintenance and repairs was $32,817,000. The report adds that the expenditures for the fiscal year just mentioned, on account of Veterans' Bureau, pensions, and the pay of retired officers of the land and naval forces, amounted to $714,005,086, and that the total expenses for the Navy were $375,291,828, for the air force $110,070,315, and for the land forces $350,457,317.

Senators will perceive from this statement that the United States not only has a large and efficient Navy but that our annual expenditures for military purposes are very great.

I also have a statement submitted by the British Government to the League of Nations bearing date of August 4, 1931, which gives in detail the military and naval forces of that Government. It shows that the global tonnage is 1,250,247 (tons), consisting of capital ships, the total tonnage of which is 555,050 (tons). There are five aircraft carriers with a total tonnage of only 115,350. One of the carriers has a tonnage of only 10,850 and another 14,450. The report shows a cruiser tonnage totaling 163,686, 30 of the number being small cruisers from 3,895 to 4,850 tons each. The total tonnage in the cruiser category is 170,665. The statement shows that the tonnage of the destroyers amounts to 184,370, and the submarine tonnage totals 61,126. Great Britain also has a number of what the statement denominates as "exempt vessels as defined by Annex I to Chapter B of Part II of the Draft Convention (cf. article 8, London Naval Treaty)."

Mr. Charles P. Howland, in his book entitled "Survey of American Foreign Relations," published in 1930, states that Japan, in 1929, had 10 capital ships and 3 aircraft carriers; France, 9 capital ships and 1 aircraft carrier; and Italy, 4 capital ships and 1 aircraft carrier. At the beginning of 1930 Japan had 29 cruisers and 4 were being built. Her destroyers numbered 101 and her submarines 61. At that time she was constructing six destroyers and six submarines. The United States has more destroyers than Great Britain and Japan combined. Mr. Howland, quoting from the report of Naval Intelligence of the United States Navy, states that no other vessel was more directly responsible for the protection of sea traffic in the Great War than the destroyer. It was an antidote for the submarine menace, "and being thrice armed with ram gun and depth charge as it pursued its prey and with a speed of 40 miles an hour, it was the deadliest foe of the submarine."

Data from the Office of Naval Intelligence of the United States as of December, 1929, shows that the United States had in its Navy 452 ships; the British Empire, 339; Japan, 233; France, 198; and Italy, 174. The total tonnage of the warcraft of the United States was 1,293,972 and that of Great Britain 1,344,412. Japan's total tonnage was 784,877. In the United States Navy there were 93,323 enlisted men; the man power of the British Navy was 89,000; Japan's had 81,595; France's, 60,834; and Italy's, 45,397.

Notwithstanding the superiority of our Navy over that of Great Britain or any other power, Secretary Wilbur in 1927 urged the construction of 71 warships. Of this number 25 were to be light cruisers, 9 destroyer leaders, 32 submarines, and 5 aircraft carriers, the estimated cost of which was between seven hundred and twenty-five and eight hundred millions of dollars. It was remarkable that this recommendation was declared to be "not in conflict with President Coolidge's policy of economy." At the same time Mr. Bridgeman, First Lord of the Admiralty, announced in the House of Commons that Great Britain had decided to drop from the list three cruisers which were to be laid down during that year.

The naval board and the navalists of the United States vigorously pushed the administration program, but opposition was developed in all parts of the United States and the administration was compelled to modify the same. A new bill was offered calling for fifteen 10,000-ton cruisers and one aircraft carrier, the cost to be approximately $300,000,000. The House passed the bill providing for the construction of these vessels, but it was not acted upon in the Senate. In the meantime the Briand-Kellogg treaty was prepared and signed in Paris in 1928. Notwithstanding the terms of this pact and the solemn agreement that the United States, as well as all other signatories, renounced war as a national policy and agreed to settle all disputes by peaceful means, the Senate in February, 1929, passed a bill authorizing the construction of 15 light cruisers and 1 aircraft carrier.

There have been persistent efforts upon the part of our Navy Department and various organizations in the United States to embark upon a stupendous naval-construction policy, and the propaganda carried on in behalf of this program has done much, in my opinion, to nullify international efforts to limit military expenditures and to prevent success in disarmament conferences.

Mr. President, I have, upon a number of occasions, declared, and I insist that the facts support the declaration, that our Navy is superior to that of Great Britain. Mr. Hector C. Bywater, a recognized authority upon naval construction and naval affairs, recently stated that—

> * * * The United States battle fleet of 18 capital ships is the only completely oil-burning fleet in the world, which gives it an immense advantage over all others in steaming radius and strategical homogeneity. It is the only fleet of which every pre-Jutland unit has been, or is being, extensively reconstructed or modernized to embody war experience. It mounts 192 heavy turret guns, as against 166 corresponding guns mounted in the British fleet.

Since Mr. Bywater made the statement just quoted, the United States has expended tens of millions of dollars in improving our capital ships. It is to be noted that six of our capital ships have been completed since the war. Great Britain has completed but three. In our fleet there are 10 ships, each with a tonnage of 30,000 or over. In our Navy there are five capital ships the guns of which outrange the British guns, with the exception of those of the Rodney and the Nelson. Our Navy has twenty-four 6-inch guns, while the British Navy has but 18.

Further comparisons between the various navies of the world will, in my opinion, establish the fact that the Navy of the United States is superior to that of any other country. In view of this fact and of the growing demand in this and other countries that the military burdens shall be reduced, it seems indefensible for the United States to expend such huge sums for the construction of war vessels and for so-called military preparedness. We should prepare for peace rather than for war.

Mr. President, our children and our children's children will be called upon to pay millions of dollars to meet the obligations of the World War. Though our expenditures to date growing out of the World War exceed $58,000,000,000, the American people have paid but a fraction of what the future will demand at their hands.

The bill before us should be defeated. Its defeat would encourage the friends of peace everywhere and give notice to the world that this Republic is not only dedicated to liberty and justice but to the cause of international good will and to world peace.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendment to be offered to the bill, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cutting	Kendrick	Shipstead
Bailey	Dale	Keyes	Shortridge
Bankhead	Davis	King	Smith
Barbour	Dickinson	La Follette	Steiwer
Bingham	Dill	Lewis	Stephens
Blaine	Fess	Logan	Thomas, Okla.
Bratton	Fletcher	McGill	Townsend
Broussard	Frazier	McKellar	Trammell
Bulkley	George	McNary	Tydings
Bulow	Glass	Metcalf	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Goldsborough	Moses	Walcott
Capper	Gore	Norris	Walsh, Mass.
Caraway	Hale	Nye	Walsh, Mont.
Carey	Hatfield	Oddie	Watson
Cohen	Hayden	Reed	Wheeler
Connally	Howell	Robinson, Ark.	White
Coolidge	Hull	Robinson, Ind.
Costigan	Johnson	Schall
Couzens	Jones	Sheppard

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. MOSES. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BULOW (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] and therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. DICKINSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] has a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]. If the Senator from Iowa were present and permitted to vote, he would vote "nay," and, I understand, if the Senator from Louisiana were present and permitted to vote he would vote "yea."

Mr. HULL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who is necessarily absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] and therefore am at liberty to vote, and vote "yea." I understand if the Senator from Vermont were present and permitted to vote, he would vote "yea."

Mr. McNARY. On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], who is necessarily absent from the Chamber. Being unable to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON]. I understand that if he were present, he would vote "yea." If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WHEELER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. THOMAS]. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HATFIELD (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. HATFIELD. I have a general pair with that Senator, but I find I can transfer that pair to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], which I do and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. FRAZIER. On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], who is unavoidably absent. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and vote "nay." I understand that the Senator from New York, if present, would vote "yea," and that the Senator from Idaho, if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. On this question I have a pair with that Senator. I understand if he were present, he would vote "yea." I, therefore, withdraw my vote.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]; and

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN] with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY].

I wish further to announce that both the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN], if present, would vote "yea."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] are absent from the Senate on official business.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] is detained from the Senate on official business. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS. I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is absent in attendance on the disarmament conference at Geneva.

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—44

Ashurst	Couzens	Kendrick	Shortridge
Bailey	Dale	Keyes	Smith
Barbour	Davis	Lewis	Steiwer
Bingham	Fess	Metcalf	Townsend
Broussard	Fletcher	Moses	Trammell
Bulkley	Goldsborough	Oddie	Tydings
Byrnes	Hale	Reed	Vandenberg
Caraway	Hatfield	Robinson, Ark.	Walcott
Carey	Hayden	Robinson, Ind.	Walsh, Mass.
Cohen	Johnson	Schall	Watson
Coolidge	Jones	Sheppard	White

NAYS—21

Bankhead	Cutting	King	Nye
Blaine	Dill	La Follette	Stephens
Bratton	Frazier	Logan	Walsh, Mont.
Capper	Glass	McGill
Connally	Gore	McKellar
Costigan	Howell	Norris

NOT VOTING—31

Austin	George	Long	Smoot
Barkley	Glenn	McNary	Swanson
Black	Harrison	Morrison	Thomas, Idaho
Borah	Hastings	Neely	Thomas, Okla.
Brookhart	Hawes	Norbeck	Wagner
Bulow	Hebert	Patterson	Waterman
Copeland	Hull	Pittman	Wheeler
Dickinson	Kean	Shipstead

So the bill was passed.

INCREASE OF BANKING FACILITIES

Mr. GLASS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business No. 604, being Senate bill 4412, the banking bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the bill be reported by its title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 4412) to provide for the safer and more effective use of the assets of Federal reserve banks and of national banking associations to regulate interbank control, to prevent the undue diversion of funds into speculative operations, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT, as in executive session, laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations and a convention, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

RADIO ADDRESS BY C. E. HUFF

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the incorporation in the RECORD of an address delivered by President C. E. Huff, of the Farmers' National Grain Corporation, by radio, April 15, 1932.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

An open break has occurred between the Chicago Board of Trade and Farmers National Grain Corporation, the national cooperative sales agency for organized grain producers. This contest is not of our choosing, but the only alternative to an open fight seems to be abject surrender.

The cooperative organizations have had too many years of experience in fighting with organized tradesmen, whose profits are threatened by the development of the cooperative movement, to be frightened or dismayed by any new contest.

An attempt is being made to mislead the public and local cooperatives as to the issues in the present difficulty. Officials of the Chicago Board of Trade declare or imply that they are entirely favorable to the cooperative movement itself, but they question Farmers National Grain Corporation's being a cooperative; and they object to Farm Board loans, under the marketing act, which they describe as Government subsidies to cooperatives. This attitude of theirs, they say, is in behalf of the producer himself, for whom they claim to have an undying affection.

Let it be recalled that when the first farmers' elevators were organized not a bushel of grain forwarded to market by them would be accepted or handled by any member of the Chicago Board of Trade unless the sale was authorized by the local cooperative elevator, making the shipment to be made in the name of a local private grain dealer (their competitor) and for his account and with a commission deduction for his benefit. They then thought that even local cooperatives were wrong. It required special action on the part of the Federal Government, the active interest of the then President of the United States and of the Attorney General to secure for farmers' elevators their initial right even to have their grain sold by a member of the Chicago Board of Trade at regular commission rates.

It seems that the board of trade now believes that the proper definition of a true cooperative is one which is small, unrelated to others of a similar character, and whose entire commodity is turned over to members of the board of trade for marketing. Any time a cooperative develops strength enough or a program broad enough seriously to interfere with the private earnings of members of boards of trade and exchanges the cry immediately goes up that they are not truly cooperative and that producers are being misled. When one notes what American farmers have done for the Chicago Board of Trade and its members, he must feel that the farmer is entitled, at least, to their undying friendship. This friendship to cooperatives in the past is not borne out by the facts of history.

The Federal Trade Commission was called to investigate the opposition which the grain exchanges were making against the Farmers Equity Exchange in St. Paul in 1918. The commission found that the organized grain trade had indulged in false and vicious propaganda and had raised substantial funds which had been expended in devious and underground ways and that a definite boycott had been established against the cooperative and the grain which it offered for sale. To correct this bad condition the Federal Trade Commission issued a permanent injunction, restraining the grain exchanges from any such practices in the future in relation to this cooperative organization. There was not at that time any federation of American business nor any war cry about "getting the Government out of business." The issue to-day is not with regard to the Federal Farm Board nor to the Government in business, but has to do solely with the development of large-scale cooperatives, which are putting the American farmer in control of his commodities in the market places in such a manner as to enable him to bargain effectively upon them and to retain for himself those final values which heretofore have passed to others in the form of commissions, discounts, and so on.

The early opposition to the cooperative movement was hardly more ridiculous than that of the present, and yet, looking backward, the utter unreasonableness of it is more completely apparent. The passing of time will reveal the folly of the present opposition.

I am reliably informed that when livestock producers undertook some 25 years ago to market their livestock in car lots directly to the terminal markets, thus substantially narrowing the spread between the farmer and such markets, an injunction was secured in the courts of Iowa against such action on the part of producers, on the ground that it violated the Constitution of the United States. It was contended that the private dealer had a vested interest in this business which cooperative marketing destroyed without due process of law. I am told that for some little time this court injunction was actually in effect prohibiting livestock producers from even attempting to lessen the tolls which were levied upon their commodity.

For nearly two years now the Chicago Board of Trade and its affiliate, the Chicago Board of Trade Clearing Corporation, have attempted to restrict the operations thereon of Farmers' National Grain Corporation, in absolute disregard of the act of Congress which guarantees to cooperatives equal trading privileges with other handlers of grain. No question as to the cooperative character of Farmers' National Grain Corporation was raised by the Chicago Board of Trade in June, 1930, when it first applied for clearing-house membership and privileges, nor was it raised in connection with our application for memberships on the board of trade itself which preceded this application.

Farmers' National Grain Corporation was organized as a central sales agency for grain cooperatives. Its cooperative characteristics have been subjected to the most rigid and technical examination by the Federal Farm Board and Federal intermediate credit banks, restricted by law to lend only to cooperatives. Its articles of incorporation and by-laws contain all standard cooperative provisions. In practice it is fully cooperative in every way.

In appealing to the Secretary of Agriculture to enforce the law governing contract markets, Farmers National Grain Corporation has taken the only course open to it short of appealing to the Federal courts. Against the charges of discrimination and violation of the grain futures act the Chicago Board of Trade and the clearing corporation attempt as their principal defense to cast doubt as to the standing of Farmers National Grain Corporation as a cooperative. They need have no worry on this score. The president of the Chicago Board of Trade has ample opportunity, if he wishes to makes use of it, to learn that Farmers National Grain Corporation is a cooperative, complying in every respect with the provisions of the Capper-Volstead Act. This act not only places limitations on the volume of nonmember business that may be handled but also provides that a cooperative must be composed of producers and must operate for the mutual benefit of its members. The act further limits the dividends which may be paid on capital stock to a maximum of 8 per cent. Farmers National Grain Corporation conforms to all of these provisions of the national cooperative statue, and is wholly owned by 28 large organizations of grain producers, which comprise in their membership upward of a quarter million actual farmers.

It is pointed out by the president of the Chicago Board of Trade that the rule No. 313, which was invoked to prevent the admission of Farmers National Grain Corporation in the clearing corporation and which is being invoked by the board of trade in an attempt to expel the Updike Grain Co., subsidiary of the national cooperative, was passed for the protection of the public and on the theory that in event of a failure the liability of officers and stockholders of the member corporation would be limited, whereas in a partnership all partners would be equally liable. There are two significant things to be noted in connection with this statement. The first is that the board of trade's interest in thus protecting the public in its dealings with members of the clearing corporation never became apparent until after the Congress of the United States, called in special session early in 1929, had gotten definitely under way legislation designed to support the development of cooperative marketing and to place grain cooperatives in such position as to make them a very important, if not a dominant, factor in the market.

It was as clearly evident to these board of trade officials then as it must be evident to the public now that rule 313 would exclude the cooperatives effectively and would in no way operate against any other individual or group. In the nature of things a cooperative can not become a partnership.

The second weakness in the argument is that a partnership is not necessarily financially sound, regardless of the liability which its members may severally have. The rule does not hinge upon the financial soundness of the member organization. It blindly provides that a corporation, regardless of its financial strength, can not be a member and offers the weak excuse that the stockholders of such corporation are not individually liable and that, therefore, the public has less protection. Farmers National Grain Corporation is certainly as responsible financially as most partnerships, is a member in good standing on the Chicago Board of Trade, and has been able at all times to meet every financial obligation or requirement. With its application for membership in the clearing corporation it submitted a copy of its current balance sheet, showing the net worth of the corporation to be approximately two and one-half million dollars.

The president of the Chicago Board of Trade implies that the national cooperative has not dealt openly and cites the fact that its purchase of the Updike Grain Co. was not revealed until brought to light by officials of the Chicago Board of Trade. When the rule 313, adopted by the board of trade only a few months in advance of the formation of the national cooperative, was cited and the corporation's application was returned, the Grain Corporation realized fully that every effort would be made to prevent its becoming a member of the clearing corporation and to restrict its operations as a member of the Chicago Board of Trade. Not wishing to make the matter one of open contest, it was entirely natural that the cooperative should have purchased the stock of a corporation already enjoying member privileges and to have carried on its business by that means. The cooperative has no apology to make for its failure to notify the board of trade of its purchase of the Updike Grain Co. Neither does that purchase nor the use of the Updike Grain Co. by Farmers National Grain Corporation have any bearing upon the corporation's right in its own name as a cooperative to the privileges of the clearing house.

The president of the Chicago Board of Trade finds the grain markets somewhat improved as to price levels and is fearful that the action of Farmers National Grain Corporation in demanding its rights under the law may result in an unfavorable turn in the grain markets and no end of injury to business in general. He should be reminded that Farmers National Grain Corporation and its affiliated cooperatives are the only agencies consistently attempting to maintain grain price levels against the frequent efforts of speculative bear raiders in the private grain trade to hammer down the level of grain prices. Many believe that these raids upon the market have for a motive the desire to cause grain producers to lose confidence in the agricultural marketing act, the Federal Farm Board, and the cooperatives. It might be stated also that the Chicago Board of Trade takes itself far too seriously if it believes that the business structure of this country is apt to suffer very seriously as the result of any action taken on the part of the Federal Government to protect the rights of producer organizations under the law against the rulings of the officials of the Chicago Board of Trade. If any ill results should follow, responsibility for such results will rest not upon those who insist upon their rights under the law but upon those who stubbornly refuse to comply with the provisions of Federal statutes for wholly selfish reasons.

Farmers National Grain Corporation engages in no speculative operations. It is acting in behalf of American grain producers and with their interests in mind, and its development over a period of only two years has had the effect of diverting such large volumes of grain from old-line to cooperative channels that every possible effort, it is apparent, is to be made by a certain element in the private grain trade to prevent further growth of the cooperative movement.

Every possible attempt is also being made to have it appear that there is some community of interest between the Chicago Board of Trade and certain cooperative groups, and that the cooperatives are themselves opposing Farmers National Grain Corporation and the Farm Board as definitely as is the board of trade. The Farmers Grain Dealers Association of Illinois is frequently quoted in this connection. Such quotations are misleading and are made too comprehensive by those who are quoted. One of the stockholder members of Farmers National Grain Corporation in Illinois is Illinois Grain Corporation, affiliated with the Illinois Agricultural Association. This latter organization has a paid-up membership of more than 58,000 farm families in the State of Illinois, and its grain organization has in its membership 84 farmers' elevators within the State which are fully cooperative under the Capper-Volstead Act. Other farmers' elevators are joining the organization almost daily. It would be interesting to know how many such elevators are actually affiliated with the Farmers Grain Dealers organization.

There can be but one outcome to this present contest. The Chicago Board of Trade will adjust itself to the new facts and factors in marketing or it will disappear. Cooperative marketing is here to serve and to succeed. Farmers will not be misled, nor can their marketing program be defeated. We shall move steadily forward.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, May 9, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate May 6 (legislative day of May 4), 1932

MEMBER OF THE UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD

T. V. O'Connor, of New York, to be a member of the United States Shipping Board for a term of six years from June 9, 1932. (Reappointment.)

MEMBER AND PRESIDENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, MAY 6, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Again, O Lord, Thou hast remembered us in our estate. Surely Thy mercies are showered upon us in crowded succession. May a sense of Thy eternal goodness compel us to silence and to confession. In wonder and in gratitude do we thank Thee. We would cherish, Heavenly Father, the greatest of gifts, which is an honest and a contrite heart. Impart a force to our wills and a warmth to our hearts that shall more than compensate for our defects and excesses. Do Thou, O Lord, greatly enrich our country; bless it abundantly with the spirit of good will, with zealous philanthropic labor, with high ideals, with an earnest, sensitive conscience, with a deep reverence for Thee, and with a charity for all men. Through Christ our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INSURANCE CORPORATIONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 27.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 27. The gentleman from Indiana explained this to the Chair this morning. It seems that some mistake was made in passing the bill, S. 3584, to require insurance corporations formed under the provisions of the Code of Law of the District of Columbia to maintain their principal offices and places within the District of Columbia. The Senate has passed the concurrent resolution asking the President to return the bill to the House and the Senate for correction. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 27

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the action of the Speaker of the House of Representatives and of the Vice President of the United States in signing the enrolled bill (S. 3584) to require all insurance corporations formed under the provisions of Chapter XVIII of the Code of Law of the District of Columbia to maintain their principal offices and places of business within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded, and that the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to reenroll the bill with the following amendment in the nature of a correction, viz: On page 1, line 11, of the engrossed House amendment, after the word "corporation," insert the following: "kept in a branch-office agency of such corporation."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, through the courtesy of the gentleman from Indiana, I became acquainted with the object of this resolution. I have given careful consideration to his proposal. In view of the fact the Senate has passed the concurrent resolution asking merely for a change of the Senate bill in one amendment, and the gentleman desires to incorporate an additional amendment, I believe it will be necessary to have the Senate concurrent resolution amended also, as well as the Senate bill.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LUDLOW to the Senate Concurrent Resolution 27: In line 11, after the word "following," strike out the word "amendment" and insert the word "amendments," and on page 1, line 12, strike out the words "a correction" and insert "corrections," and at the end of the resolution, strike out the period, insert a semicolon, and add the following:

On page 1, line 12, of the engrossed House amendment, after the word "agency," insert the following: "nor to any corporation created by special act of Congress wherein the principal place of business is fixed pursuant to such act at some other place."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, did the gentleman from Indiana take this matter up with the chairman of the District Committee, Mrs. NORTON?

Mr. LUDLOW. I took the matter up with the chairman of the Senate District Committee and with the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON], chairman of the House District Committee, also with the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], and I believe they are all agreed as to the desirability of this amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, I present Mr. HOWARD W. STULL, of the twentieth district of Pennsylvania, recently elected, who desires to take the oath of office.

Mr. STULL appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SNOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter which I received this morning from the chamber of commerce in my home city of Bangor, Me.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, we have all received communications, and I object.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were closed.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and fourteen Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

A QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RANKIN. On Tuesday, May 3, 1932, the New York Evening Post, a paper of general circulation throughout the country and especially in New York and Washington, published an editorial headed "Treason," in which it indicted 316 Members of this House of betraying our country.

I will read enough from that editorial to leave no doubt in the mind of anyone that it raises a question of personal privilege.

The editorial states:

An act of sheer treason to the Republic was committed by yesterday's vote in the House.

Under the rascally leadership of RANKIN, of Mississippi, the Members suspended the rules, choked off debate, and, by the overwhelming vote of 316 to 16, plumped for a bill pensioning widows and orphans of World War veterans.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman states a question of personal privilege.

Mr. RANKIN. The editorial also states that—

Ever since, by legislation, Congress extended the period of the war, almost all pension and bonus bills have been dishonest.

On the same page, under an editorial headed "Write Your Congressman," they published a copy of a post card sent out to individuals over the country by what they call a "nonpartisan group," asking them to sign this post card and mail it to their Senators. Among other things, that post card has printed on it, "Kill the bonus and stop raids on the Treasury; enact fair sales tax and stamp tax," and so forth.

Then, commenting editorially, it reads:

> This is an excellent idea, but it would be still better to write your Representative as well as one of your Senators. * * * Write both your Representative and at least one of your Senators.

Mr. Speaker, that editorial, as I said, brands as traitors 316 Members of the House of Representatives who voted for the bill for the relief of the dependent, penniless widows and orphans of veterans of the World War.

Permit me to say to you here what I have said elsewhere, that I have never in all my career impugned the patriotism of a single Member of Congress. Members may differ with me, I may disagree with other Members, but I am sure that every Member of this House is at least as patriotic as the slime-monger editor who penned that vicious editorial. [Applause.]

He says that we are pensioning the "favored few." In other words, the widows and orphans of veterans of the World War are considered the "favored few" by this paper that is owned by the Curtis Publishing Co., which also owns the Saturday Evening Post, the Country Gentleman, and the Ladies' Home Journal.

Of all people who are willing to accuse anybody of being the favored ones, the Saturday Evening Post and those who own the Curtis Publishing Co. are the last ones on earth who should make the accusation; and of all people on earth the dependent widows and orphans of the veterans of the World War are the last ones against whom it should be made.

This bill provides compensation for a great many widows and orphans of veterans who died of disabilities which were incurred in the World War. Many of them were unable to prove their service connection. That was the case in many instances in my State and in all other States.

When they finally passed away, their widows and orphans were denied a single penny of compensation. Some of them did not apply. There were a great many men who felt, through patriotic impulses, that they ought not to apply, yet when they passed away and this terrible crash came on, we find their widows and orphans penniless, and we attempt by this Rankin bill to provide a meager compensation of $20 a month for the mother and $6 a month for each child.

There were others who were ignorant, who did not know that they had a right to apply, and who were entitled to service connection on their disabilities. Not only that, but there were a great many of them who had service-connected disabilities and who had been so adjudged but who died from some other malady. I remember one woman wrote a Member of Congress and said that her husband was blind. He was blinded in battle and he drew compensation, but after the war he was accidentally killed or died from some other cause, and she was denied a single penny of compensation.

Therefore those all came within the provisions of this bill, and yet the editor of the New York Evening Post says that the men who voted to give this small compensation are traitors to their country.

I am going to pass this subject on, but let me say that as far as I am individually concerned I will never sit idly by and see the widows and orphans of World War veterans who honorably served their country in time of war begging their bread from door to door. [Applause.]

This bill was indorsed by the American Legion in every State in the Union. Practically every American Legion post from the Great Lakes to the Gulf and from ocean to ocean approved it. They indorsed it at their national convention.

The Veterans of Foreign Wars, every one of whom saw foreign service, indorsed it.

The Disabled Veterans of the World War, those men who were injured in the service, in every State in the Union, indorsed this bill, and it passed this House by an almost unanimous vote. Yet the editor of the New York Evening Post says that those who voted for it committed treason against their country.

This New York Evening Post, as I said, is owned by the Curtis Publishing Co., the president of which is one Cyrus Hermann Kotzchmar Curtis. He is now 82 years old. Arthur Brisbane, perhaps the most brilliant editorial writer in the world, and certainly one of the best-informed men in America, said a short time ago that Mr. Curtis, who was wintering in Florida, has an individual net income of $12,000,000 a year! He is the head of this publishing company that is now denouncing as traitors those who attempt to take care of the distressed widows and orphans of the World War.

This one man with his $12,000,000 a year has a net income greater than that of all the farmers put together in the States of Mississippi, Texas, Illinois, or Iowa.

I pointed out in my speech some time ago that the Curtis Publishing Co. gets a bonus from the Government every week in the form of postal concessions.

A news dispatch from Philadelphia, dated February 10, 1930, said:

> The annual report of the Curtis Publishing Co., publishers of the Saturday Evening Post and other magazines, indicates that its chief owner, Cyrus H. K. Curtis, will have only an academic interest in old-age pensions for another year at least.
> Net earnings on invested capital for 1929 ran above 71 per cent. * * * In this connection it should be noted that the United States post office lost $94,000,000 on second-class matter last year. That enormous subsidy to publishers is one reason why such concerns as the Curtis Co. can report 71 per cent profits on investment.

It was shown by the debate on the tax bill that second-class mail, consisting in the main of these large publications, get what you might term concessions of $97,000,000 a year. In other words, it costs the Government $97,000,000 a year more to carry their publications than they pay the Government, and as a result it enables them to send their publications at a cost to the Government and to monopolize advertisements that should go to the local weekly and daily papers throughout the country. I know, because I once owned a local paper, and I was a victim of this perfidious practice, as every newspaperman in a small town is to-day, be he the owner of a weekly or a daily paper. I am reliably informed that $25,000,000 of this $97,000,000 bonus went to magazines such as the Saturday Evening Post and that $3,000,000 of it went to the Curtis Publishing Co. alone.

But I want to show you some of the advertising that they are monopolizing at the expense of the local publisher in your community and in mine and to give you some idea of what the country is paying for it. There [exhibiting] is a double-page advertisement that I am reliably informed brings $10,000 a week. You pay them a bonus or allow them a concession through the Post Office Department in order that such advertisements may be carried at Government expense into every nook and corner, home, and hamlet in the United States. That is not the only one. There are seven of these double-page colored advertisements in this issue of the Saturday Evening Post, that is owned and operated by the Curtis Publishing Co., which owns this New York Evening Post, from which this scurrilous editorial comes.

You might look it over and see how much they are plundering the Government for in order to take their advertisements to every nook and corner of the United States. They do not care anything about the reading matter in that publication. Why, the paper in that magazine costs more than you pay for the magazine. It is an advertising vehicle, and the publishers are getting a rake-off, if you please, from the Federal Government to carry them into your communities to absorb the advertisements that ought to go to the struggling newspapers throughout the country.

Not only that, but there are 14 colored 1-page advertisements in this issue. I did not have time to count up all of this stuff. I am told that each of these 14 one-page advertisements costs $5,000 a week. In addition to that, there are 18 whole-page advertisements such as this one [exhibiting] and a multitude of half-page advertisements and quarter-page advertisements all the way through it. They get a bonus from the Government every week.

One reason they do not like me is because I exposed that when we were debating the tax bill some time ago. But they say that if you vote to take care of these World War widows and orphans, some of whom are standing in the bread line right in the shadow of the building in which these periodicals are published, you are a traitor to your country.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right at that point?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield for just a question; yes.

Mr. GILBERT. We have heard that. I want to know why something is not done about it. Why raise postage on first-class matter? Is there no way in which we can rectify the matter?

Mr. RANKIN. I want to get to that. This advertisement which this editorial indorses says, "Enact a fair sales tax and stamp tax." They want to put another tax of 1 cent on the poor mother who writes a letter to her son who is out looking for a job, and then add a sales tax to everything she buys. The inspiration for a lot of this support of the 3-cent stamp on first-class mail came from the Saturday Evening Post, the Ladies' Home Journal, the Country Gentleman, and the muck-raking editor of the New York Evening Post, who, by his editorial attacks on Members of Congress, has rendered himself deserving of the just contempt of every decent mind.

Mr. Speaker, this paper represents concentrated wealth. It is the spokesman for the house of Morgan. It is the spokesman for those international bankers who have been trying to force us to adopt a sales tax and to pass the burden of running this Government on to the masses of the American people. We are suffering to-day from concentrated wealth. There has never been a period in all the history of mankind when wealth has concentrated into the hands of a few as rapidly as it has in the last few years.

In 1921 there were 21 individuals in the United States with yearly incomes of $1,000,000 or more. In 1929, the last year for which we have complete figures, there were 513. In 1921 only 21 individuals had incomes of $1,000,000 a year. In 1929 there were 513 with incomes of $1,000,000 or more a year. They had multiplied twenty-five times.

In 1921 there were 63 individuals with incomes of from $500,000 to $1,000,000 a year. In 1929 there were 976. They had multiplied fifteen times. In 1921 there were 162 people with yearly incomes of from $300,000 to $500,000. In 1929 there were 1,641. They had multiplied ten times.

During that time the people in the agricultural States had gone down and down and down in the economic scale, until to-day they are bankrupt; they are hopelessly appealing to this Government to bring them some measure of relief.

During that time the administration reduced income taxes, under the pressure of these big interests, $750,000,000 a year. If we had collected that tax all along and had it in the Federal Treasury to-day, we would have a balanced Budget; we would have sufficient money to pay these widows and orphans; to pay off the veterans' adjusted-service certificates, and to meet the obligations of this Government. But they pressed and pressed until they secured these reductions.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. For a brief question.

Mr. CONNERY. This editorial says this was not done for the benefit of the men who fought in battle. I had a man in my office yesterday who was in a combat unit in France. He is getting $18 a month, although he is 50 per cent disabled. He is getting that small amount because he would not report his injury, but chose to stay in the battle line; and if he should die to-morrow his widow would not get a nickel, would she?

Mr. RANKIN. Not unless this bill becomes a law.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the last few years, under the pressure of this same element, there has been turned back to these big income-tax payers $3,000,000,000. Three billions that it is claimed they had overpaid. If we had that money in the Treasury to-day—and in my humble opinion if those cases were reexamined we would get most if not all of it back into the Treasury—we would have the money with which to balance the Budget.

In addition to that, these same international bankers, represented by the New York Evening Post and by the Saturday Evening Post, demanded that we fund the foreign debts. Why? In order that they might strengthen their foreign loans. By their pressure they forced through a bill that reduced the foreign debts to an extent that it cost the American people $6,200,000,000. Last year they came in and demanded a moratorium by which we relinquished for the time being, at least, $262,000,000. Now, this same element is demanding a further moratorium, if not further reductions and cancellations of these foreign debts, in order to strengthen their securities, or loans, abroad.

O Mr. Speaker, this concentration of wealth is what is ruining this country to-day. Less than 5 per cent of the people of this Republic own more than 90 per cent of its wealth, and yet we have more suffering, more failures, more foreclosures, more bankruptcies, more hunger, more unemployed, and more suicides than we have ever had in all the history of mankind.

They attack us because they do not want taxes raised on the larger estates of this country. The only way on earth to reach these large estates, to break up these large fortunes, and turn this money back into the channels of our economic life is by raising the inheritance tax, yet they are trying to head that off by demanding in this editorial that we impose a sales tax upon everything the laboring man buys, from the swaddling clothes of infancy to the lining of the coffin in which old age is laid away, and on even the tombstone which marks his last resting place.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. McGUGIN. Is it not a fact that the sales tax which was voted upon in this House exempted food, clothing, and drugs?

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, that is beside the issue. They merely wanted to establish the policy now. Then they could amend the law later to include everything.

They want to place that tax on the laboring man, on the very pail in which he carries his lunch. Every farmer would be taxed on everything he wears and everything he eats before this sales tax would finally be consummated. They want to press down upon the backs of the American people the burden of running this Government and turn these widows and orphans out into the cold without one penny during this period of the greatest economic depression the world has ever known.

As I said a while ago, the concentration of wealth, together with its twin evil, the centralization of political power, go hand in hand. They have been the wreck and ruin of every nation whose skeleton marks the shores of time.

When Rome fell 600 people owned the Roman Empire. When Cæsar was murdered he was fighting a group of financial Shylocks who were charging the people of Rome 48 per cent interest. They hired their minions to destroy him, and when they had slain the greatest statesman as well as the greatest friend of the common people of ancient times they stooped and bathed their traitorous hands in patriotic blood and said to each other, "How many ages hence shall this lofty scene be acted over in states unborn and accents yet unknown?"

To show you how prophetic they were, to-day we see the editor of the New York Evening Post, this minion of predatory wealth, not bathing his hands in the blood of a Cæsar but in the tears of the suffering widows and orphans of the World War, arrogating to himself the patriotism of the country and denouncing you as a traitor.

When Babylon fell 1 per cent of the people of Babylon owned practically all the wealth. When Egypt fell one family owned the Egyptian Empire. Everywhere that there has been a concentration of wealth and a centralization of power it has resulted in governmental degeneracy, national decay, and the ultimate fall of the country in which it prevailed.

One of the great orators of this country once said that it took Rome 400 years to die; that our death, should we perish, will be as much more terrific, as our intense civilization has given us more bones and sinew and nerve and strength and vitality.

Unless we turn back this wave of wealth control, unless this Congress rises to a level it has not risen to so far, and places the burden of running this Government where it belongs, and relieves the American people from the clutches of those who control the finances of this country, I am not sure that we will not have embarked upon a decline that will end in the wreck and ruin of the most glorious republic that ever existed in the tides of time. [Applause.]

But this editor says that we are dishonest because we advocate the payment of the veterans' adjusted-service certificates. This charge is not new. Ogden L. Mills, the Secretary of the Treasury, speaking before the Ways and Means Committee the other day, branded our motives as dishonest and said we were trying to pay these veterans in dishonest dollars.

Well, we are trying to use the same kind of dollars that were issued by Abraham Lincoln during the Civil War. They were not called dishonest then, and while, as I have said, I am what you might term a radical southerner, I would be very glad indeed if we could swap Ogden Mills for Abraham Lincoln to-day. [Applause.] I would consider it a glorious exchange. [Applause.]

They say this money is not due. If we had paid these boys the same rate of interest that we paid the profiteers and contractors during the war, it would have been due in October, 1931—every dollar of it.

But they say we are trying to issue dishonest money. We have had this hearing before the Ways and Means Committee, and the best economists in America have said that this money would have behind it the same amount of gold that is now behind the money issued through the Federal reserve system. Every one of them agreed that there must be an expansion of the currency or there must be an expansion of credit. There was only one exception, and that was a Doctor Kammeyer, who seems to be the self-appointed guardian of the gold standard throughout the world, and about the only remedy he offered was to let the patient die. He was, apparently, the representative of the house of Morgan, indirectly, at least, in South America, at the time those South American bonds were being issued and unloaded upon the people of this country, and if he was and did not know about it, he is not sufficiently informed on economic matters to follow, and if he did know about it and did not inform the American people, he is unfit to follow.

Again, we propose that if they do not take that bill, to take the Owen bill and issue the money through the Federal reserve system. You would not call it dishonest money then. You did not call it dishonest money when they were financing the stock "jamboree" in 1929.

It has never been dishonest money. That money will be just as honest and worth dollar for dollar with every other American dollar in existence to-day.

But, they say, if you expand the currency the dollar will go down, and they tell us that all the bonds in the United States, including municipal bonds and railroad bonds, are payable in gold. Suppose they are. There is not enough gold on earth to pay them. Nobody ever demands the gold, and to show you that this would have no effect on these bonds, in 1914 we had only $34.93 per capita in circulation. In 1920 we had $53.21, or $18 more per capita, and yet those bonds did not depreciate; but I will tell you what did happen and what will happen again. Cotton went to 30 cents a pound, wheat went to $2.50 a bushel, corn went to $1.75 a bushel, and if you will expand the currency to that extent and put it in circulation, it will do the same thing again.

Some of you may think we are expanding the currency now. I will prove to you that we are not. We are going downward in a vicious circle.

The money that you appropriated here for the $2,000,000,000 corporation goes to the local bank and is immediately paid——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a discussion of Julius Cæsar and a vicious circle is not discussing the question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi will proceed in order.

Mr. RANKIN. I am answering this editorial and the gentleman from Washington is not going to make my speech. [Applause.]

The small banker pays the large banker what he owes him, because he is pressing him; and he in turn goes to the Federal reserve and takes up his bonds and that money is retired, and instead of inflating or expanding, we are moving in a vicious circle and going down and down and contracting the currency every month. To show this, from December 31, 1931, to January 31, 1932, we contracted $5,000,000; and from January 31, to February 29, we contracted $38,000,000.

And from that time to March 31 we contracted $144,000,000.

The Washington Post of April 29 said, speaking about the report of the Federal Reserve Board, that it reported $27,000,000 shrinkage in the currency up to April 29. That brings it up to date. That shows that we are contracting our currency, while conditions are growing worse as a result. Wheat, cotton, and corn and all other commodities are lower to-day than at any time previous; and yet those of us who are trying to remedy the situation by bringing about an expansion of the currency, those of us who are trying to bring back the prices of agricultural commodities, are denounced by the Secretary of the Treasury as attempting to have the Government issue dishonest money.

Something must be done. We can never pay these bonds in gold.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi must confine himself to the question of personal privilege.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Washington did not want me to get the floor. That is the trouble with him.

The SPEAKER. Let the Chair make a statement. The gentleman from Mississippi is speaking to a question of personal privilege, where the Members of the House are charged with treason and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] is charged with being a rascal and leading them. The question before the House is whether it is a treasonable House and whether or not the gentleman from Mississippi is a rascal. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. I see that one of the alleged traitors was the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON]. I am trying to protect him from his friends. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, we must stop this concentration of wealth. We must bring back the purchasing power of the American people if we are to have a new era of prosperity. When we have done that, Mr. Speaker, when, instead of the rule of gold, we have reestablished the Golden Rule in our national and international relations, we will have stepped forward into a new era and a new civilization. [Applause.]

We can then witness the dawning of that glorious age of which Tennyson dreamed when he said:

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the vision of the world, and all the wonder that would be;

Saw the heavens fill with commerce, argosies of magic sails,
Pilots of the purple twilight, dropping down with costly bales;

Heard the heavens fill with shouting, and there rain'd a ghastly dew
From the nations' airy navies grappling in the central blue;

Far along the world-wide whisper of the south-wind rushing warm,
With the standards of the peoples plunging thro' the thunderstorm;

Till the war-drum throbb'd no longer, and the battle-flags were furl'd
In the Parliament of man, the Federation of the world.

There the common sense of most shall hold a fretful realm in awe,
And the kindly earth shall slumber, lapt in universal law.

Godspeed that day when it shall come. [Applause.]

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LUCE. Do I understand the Chair to rule that language denouncing the Congress gives warrant for a question of personal privilege?

The SPEAKER. No. The Chair did not say that. The editorial read to the House, and which the Chair examined this morning, charged the House with having been guilty of treason and charged the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] with being a rascal and leading the treason of the House. The Chair thinks undoubtedly that is a reflection upon the character of the gentleman from Mississippi. It calls him a rascal and charges that he was leading a treasonable House. If that is not a reflection on his character, the Chair does not know how to interpret the English language.

Mr. LUCE. May I further inquire if a statement by a Democratic correspondent, printed in a Democratic paper, in respect of the action of which the gentleman from Mississippi has addressed himself, to the effect—

> That is bad enough; but when this economy debacle follows closely upon the 5-to-1 passage of a general pension bill for widows of war veterans, adding millions more to the billion dollars already being paid for soldier compensation, rotten is the only word to use. If this has been matched in cowardice and stupidity, it can not now be recalled—would give me warrant to rise to a question of personal privilege?

The SPEAKER. Whether the writer of the article referred to be a Democrat or a Republican, or whether the article be published in a Democratic, a Republican, or a Socialist paper, the question is, Has it general circulation in the United States, and does it reflect on the character of a Member? A general indictment against the membership of the House is not a question of personal privilege.

Mr. LUCE. May I further inquire whether language by which the leaders of the House are severely criticized in this article would permit one who is not a leader of the House to rise in their defense?

The SPEAKER. It would undoubtedly permit the gentleman from Massachusetts to do that. [Laughter.]

STATE, JUSTICE, COMMERCE, AND LABOR APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill, H. R. 9349, making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to all of the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. THATCHER. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, for I believe that all of these appropriation bills should go to conference, I reserve the right to object in order to ask the gentleman whether the Senate cut in respect to mining activities, amounting to $123,000, and for an air mail route in the Northwest, $200,000, will have the effect of curtailing the appropriations made for the Department of Commerce by the House?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think the House can rely upon the conferees carrying out the wishes of the House.

Mr. THATCHER. As expressed in the passage of the bill originally?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. And I will make this further statement: I have had sufficient information to lead me to conclude that the House would not like the total amount carried by the Senate to be increased, should the conference committee decide to recommend any increase, without the matter being first submitted to the House for approval or disapproval. That will be done.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman from Kentucky refers to the increase in the Bureau of Mines. I understand that it was admitted in the House by the gentleman who offered the amendment reducing the appropriation for the Bureau of Mines that that cut was too great and would impair the activities of that bureau. The gentleman has that in mind.

Mr. THATCHER. But these items of increase are in no wise as important as the items of the Department of Commerce unduly decreased in the other Chamber.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. My statement related to the total amount carried by the Senate bill, and not to any specific appropriation; but if the conferees should decide to recommend any increases in the total amount, the matter will be first brought back to the House for its approval.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I would like to have five minutes in which to discuss the bill before it is sent to conference.

The SPEAKER. Would the gentleman be satisfied to address the House for five minutes under the unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; that would satisfy me.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed the following conferees:

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama, Mr. GRIFFIN, Mr. CANNON, Mr. BLANTON, Mr. SHREVE, Mr. TINKHAM.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, it will be impossible for me to go into this bill in this State Department appropriation in a short time, but I want to call the attention of the conference committee and of the House to the destruction which the Senate has wrought to this bill.

Facts in regard to the appropriations for the Department of State

Appropriations for 1932	$18,365,073.34
Budget estimates, 1933	16,683,071.89
Amount approved by the House, 1933	15,192,148.33
Amount approved by the Senate, 1933	13,658,761.12

The appropriation carried in the bill as approved by the Senate is—

Below the House bill, 10 per cent.

Below the Budget estimates, 18 per cent.

Below the appropriation for the current year of 1932, 26 per cent.

Department of State partially self-supporting

Appropriations in House bill	$15,192,148
Fees received and deposited in the Treasury:
From the Foreign Service	3,135,226
From passports issued	828,789
Net estimated expenditure in 1933	11,228,133

Appropriations compared with business gained through efforts of the Foreign Service

Appropriations in House bill	$15,192,148
Dollars and cents results of trade promotion by consular officers, 1931	19,361,239
Excess of trade results over appropriation for 1933 as approved by the House	4,169,091

If we take the Senate amount, it shows an excess of $5,702,578.

SOME EFFECTS OF ACCEPTANCE OF SENATE REDUCTION

Officers and employees to be dismissed, distributed among practically all of the States of the Union, 456.

Percentage of entire personnel dismissed, 9 per cent.

Discontinuance of passport agency at Seattle.

Discontinuance of courier service between diplomatic missions in Europe.

Discontinuance of all post allowances.

Discontinuance of all representation allowances.

Reduction of quarters allowances from an average of $800 to $624, or possibly even to $327.

Reduction of commercial work just when our depressed condition makes markets necessary.

Expenditure of additional $200,000 for Foreign Service transportation.

Handicapping of the Mexican and Canadian Boundary Commissions.

Violation of obligation of United States to International Prison Commission, International Commission of Tables of Constants, International Institute of Agriculture, International Society for Exploration of the Arctic Regions, International Fisheries Commission, International Road Congress, and Gorgas Memorial Laboratory.

Handicapping of the United States Court for China.

I call the attention of the conferees to the fact that in a bill which I introduced in this House during the early part of the session, which passed the House and is now on the Senate Calendar and will pass the Senate, provision is made for $698,000 additional revenue from the passports of persons traveling abroad.

The Senate has appropriated $2,365,438 for salaries of clerks in the Foreign Service. This is a reduction of $351,000 below the Budget estimate and nearly $300,000 below the House appropriation. If the conference committee allows this great reduction to prevail, it will mean that some 130 clerks who have been trained in the service, are efficient, and are highly necessary will have to be dropped from the rolls. Most of them will be American clerks because, receiving the highest salaries, they will likely be dismissed in order to save the most money. This reduction will throw out of employment many persons who have families to support and who have, by legislation enacted by this Congress, been given every right to consider their positions permanent. The irony of the thing, however, is this: The reduction will not be much of a saving, because the Government will be compelled to pay their transportation back home, together with that of their families and their effects. This would amount to probably $60,000 or $70,000, so while you will lose the services of 130 well-trained, able, and efficient clerks you will really gain very little in saving.

Then, again, the Senate has appropriated for salaries of Foreign Service officers $3,075,000, a reduction beneath the Budget of $365,000. Of this, $66,000 was intended to be used for promotions and increases of salaries under the present law, but, according to the bill passed by the House several days ago, all promotions and increases of salaries have been obliterated for the next year. These increases and promotions would have amounted to $66,500, as that has been cut out. There is left a difference of $298,500 in the reduction of these salaries for Foreign Service officers. If this deduction is allowed to prevail, there must be dismissed from the service approximately 140 officers, some 18 per cent of the career personnel. They must be dropped from the service at a time when we are absolutely in need of more business, and this business can practically be obtained only by the Foreign Service officers.

Mr. SHREVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I yield.

Mr. SHREVE. Is there any provision in the law made for bringing those men home?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes. They are our men and we are compelled to bring them home just as they went.

It would be a terrible thing to dismiss these clerks and Foreign Service officers at a time when the country needs them most. Moreover, it would have a very deterrent effect upon young men who desire to enter the service who heretofore have considered it a permanent position for life and trained themselves for it to such an extent that they are of little use in any other profession or career. These men, with their clerks, have brought to the country in export business, as I have said, $19,300,000—about $5,500,000 more than the appropriation bill, as it passed the Senate, provided. This reduction would be of little service to the country as a saving proposition, because in their case, as in the case of the clerks, they must be brought home with their families and effects at Government expense, and it is estimated that this would cost around $125,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman knows that the Budget is the agent of the President, to do his will. The President's Budget, which was brought in here last December, asked us to appropriate about $4,000,000,000 and on yesterday he came in and said he had made a mistake; that he wanted us to reduce it $361,000,000.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman ought not to take my time for that.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman think we ought to go on doing what the gentleman suggests, regardless of what the President says?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will be frank with the gentleman and say that I think the House has been doing too much what the President wants done already.

Mr. BLANTON. We have been doing more in the way of economy than he wants us to. We have been reducing expenses and he did not want it done or he would not have brought us his $4,000,000,000 Budget.

Mr. LINTHICUM. If the gentleman will read the President's address to-day he will find that while the House has been following the President, he will bring it back upon the Democrats as a boomerang.

Mr. BLANTON. We are 50 miles ahead of the President on economy at every stage of the proceedings.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Now, I speak particularly to the gentleman from Alabama, chairman of the committee.

Now, my suggestion to the conference committee on the proposition of clerks and Foreign Service officers, is to take the $698,000 which would come into revenue by virtue of H. R. 9393, entitled "To increase passport fees, and for other purposes," now on the Senate Calendar and assured of passage, and with that fund in contemplation, restore to the clerks the $351,000 and to the Foreign Service officers the $298,000, making a total of $649,000, and let us have a continuation of the splendid Foreign Service which we now enjoy. It would not be a bad idea to add to that $649,000 the $32,000 which has been lopped off the contingent expenses so that we may continue that service as heretofore.

As I have said, it will cost around $200,000 to bring these men home so that the appropriation of the $649,000 would be only about $449,000 additional to what has been provided.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The committee will give very careful consideration to every matter connected with these different appropriations, but may I say to the gentleman there is one matter that his own committee should give attention to, and that is a Senate amendment, adopted without any hearing in the closing days of the last session of Congress, relating to personnel legislation, which I think many Members of the House know nothing about, and into which the gentleman's committee should give some definite information to this House. It was bad legislation, and passed without the House having an opportunity to consider it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I think so, but that does not affect this appropriation bill.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes; it has affected this very appropriation.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I further suggest to the conference committee and to this House that the appropriation of $625,000 for salaries of ambassadors and ministers, which has been reduced some $21,500 below the actual salaries provided by law, that this appropriation be so amended that salaries which were intended for unfilled positions may not be impounded. In that way the appropriation will be sufficient. If this is not done, certainly there must be an additional appropriation, because these salaries are provided by law and must be paid.

I neglected to say that under the contingent expenses there is provided a courier service throughout Europe which seems to me absolutely essential and which every country maintains. It was my pleasure to travel with one of these courier men last year en route to Istanbul—a man named Stevens, who had a most enviable history, a very capable man, and it has been only within the last few days that I heard of his death. His associate in this service is a man named Warren M. Hamilton, who is now carrying on the service.

No successor to Stevens has been appointed so far as I know. It is a service which is generally unknown. These couriers starting from Paris carry bags of mail belonging to the United States Government and also important documents, and leave them in the hands of some person connected with the embassy or legation in the respective cities. For instance, Stevens was on his way from Paris, Vienna, Budapest, Belgrade, Sofia, Istanbul, and then on the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles to Athens, Italy, and on back to Paris, and so this courier service goes on every two weeks through Europe. Others go to the north, covering all the legations and embassies of the United States in Europe.

Unless this contingent expense account is increased above what the Senate has provided, this courier service will most likely be dropped, which would be a very dangerous proposition on the part of the United States Government.

I think it is very much to be regretted that the Senate has reduced the post allowances to $50,000, one-half of that appropriated in 1932 and $100,000 less than the Budget estimate. This big reduction will work a hardship upon Foreign Service officers who have depended upon it to make both ends meet. It will, moreover, bring about a great uncertainty in regard to compensation and allowances which have been so disastrous in the past. Certainly the conference committee on the part of the House should at least restore the amount to $100,000, which was provided by the House of Representatives when the bill passed.

Representation allowances have been practically wiped out by the Senate. The Budget estimate for 1933 is $125,000, and the House cut it to $25,000, which is totally and absolutely insufficient and just casts us back upon the old policy that these places are intended for the rich and not for the poor or those of moderate means. Young men who may be the ablest in our land, but who have not had the time to amass a fortune, will be completely cut out. At least one-half of the ambassadors and ministers are men who have risen from the ranks, are of long service, found to be absolutely capable, and have been promoted to their positions. Many of them are not men of means, and if too much is taken from their allowances they will not be able to continue in the service.

There are many other items as suggested by the first part of my speech which have been sorely cut by the Senate. I trust the conference committee of this House may examine these provisions carefully and restore to the bill as near as possible the appropriations as made by the House of Representatives. This may be a time of depression, it may be the time for cuts in the various appropriation bills, but this is one service which brings to the Government a very large sum as an offset to the appropriations made. It brings to the country a large export business, and it is the only "peace" department of the Government. Its endeavors to keep in touch with foreign matters and to adjust them in accordance with universal opinion is of great importance. As I say, it is a shame to maim a department of this kind, and it is my sincere wish that the conference committee may remedy the situation as far as possible.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11897) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes; and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that the House proceed to-day with general debate, the time to be divided between the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] and myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi if there is any agreement about to-morrow?

Mr. COLLINS. No; but later in the day I will probably make a suggestion that anybody who desires to speak on extraneous subjects speak to-day so that the debate that follows to-morrow will be confined to the bill.

Mr. BARBOUR. Has the gentleman considered adjourning over to-morrow and taking up the bill on Monday?

Mr. COLLINS. No; I have not. I think we ought to proceed with this bill to-morrow.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman consider that during the afternoon along with the other matter?

Mr. COLLINS. I will be glad to consider it, but I am afraid I will not be able to act in accordance with the gentleman's wishes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11897, with Mr. LANHAM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] 30 minutes.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill is the last of the annual appropriation bills which will be presented to the House. I have heretofore made statements to the House relative to the amount of reductions which have been made in the previous bills.

I want to take this opportunity to express what I am sure ought to be the appreciation of the House, the country, and their own constituents, to the members of the subcommittee, of which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] is chairman, for the work done by this committee and in the preparation of this bill. [Applause.]

I shall not discuss the bill except to refer to the reduction. This bill carries a total appropriation of $386,793,861, as reported to the House by the committee. That constitutes a reduction below the President's estimates of $24,569,901. The total reductions which have been reported to the House by the Committee on Appropriations upon this and all previous bills, and which have passed the House, amount to $161,455,101.56. [Applause.]

In my judgment, that is a most remarkable showing, especially when we are told in the President's message on yesterday that the reductions must come from a sum not exceeding $1,700,000,000.

Let me say again what I have had occasion to say heretofore upon this floor in connection with these reductions, that the reductions have not been made in a haphazard manner.

I want to say to the credit of every member of the Committee on Appropriations on both sides of the Chamber that no committee has ever given more painstaking, more earnest, or more careful consideration to every item of the various appropriation bills than have the members of the Committee on Appropriations who have prepared and reported these bills. For weeks and for months the subcommittees have sat in session holding hearings and examining those who appeared in behalf of the various items contained in the bill.

There was no understanding at the outset that any particular item or any particular bill was going to be reduced in any particular amount. The only understanding that the Committee on Appropriations had when it began the consideration of these estimates was that it was not in any single instance going to increase any item of a bill, and that it was going to cut every item that it possibly could to the bone. [Applause.]

And I want to say to you that from my examination of these items and these bills, and from my long experience of more than 20 years upon the Committee on Appropriations, that no committee has ever performed a better job than your Committee on Appropriations. I say that with reference to the membership on both sides of this Chamber [applause], because, as has been often said, the question of appropriating money is by no means a partisan matter. It has no place in politics, and I am sorry that anyone, no matter how high the position he holds, has sought to drag it into politics and make it a political football, possibly, in the coming campaign. [Applause.]

I am going to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including the figures which show the various reductions made in the estimate submitted by the President. Let me remind you that had it not been for your Committee on Appropriations and this House, which was so sharply criticized on yesterday, you would have been put in the attitude of appropriating at the request of the President $161,000,000 more than was appropriated for the year 1933.

Mr. BLANTON. More than we have appropriated.

Mr. BYRNS. More than we have appropriated.

Mr. CROSSER. Is it the gentleman's statement that the President recommended $160,000,000 more than has been appropriated?

Mr. BLANTON. We have cut him down that much.

Mr. CROSSER. That is what I mean.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I wish the further right to extend my remarks by inserting a table that shows a reduction from the appropriations for 1932 of $563,601,223.35.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I did not understand the gentleman's last statement; I did not understand to what the five hundred millions of dollars referred.

Mr. BYRNS. That is a reduction in the appropriations which were made for 1932.

Now, I recall—and I see my friend in front of me—that the only criticism which has been made of the Committee on Appropriations for its reduction came from my friend the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS]. He told this House that the real reductions did not amount to more than forty or fifty millions of dollars, or some figure like that, and that we would have to come back here next winter and make deficiency appropriations to cover the remainder, when his President and mine in his message yesterday said that these estimates could be cut—his estimates, mind you—$331,000,000. I wonder what the gentleman from Nebraska will have to say to that! It was an unkind blow to the gentleman who made his criticism immediately after a call at the White House.

And while I mention that, let me call your attention to the fact that these estimates were sent up here last December. I say it is an indictment of himself—and I am speaking plainly—and an indictment of his Budget and an indictment of every head of his departments when he tells us within four months after he submitted these estimates that they ought to be cut $331,000,000 below the amount that he told us last December we ought to appropriate. [Applause.] I do not like to talk this way, but the time has come for plain speaking, and if my words can be a criticism of anyone, I will have to let the facts speak for themselves.

Why was it that the President of the United States, last December, did not tell Congress to cut these estimates $331,000,000? [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Why did he not do it himself? It was his Budget, and he had the power and authority to cut it as low as he desired.

Mr. BYRNS. As the gentleman from Texas says, Why did he not go farther and do what the Budget law imposes upon him as a sacred duty and cut them himself, if he thought they could have been cut to that extent?

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. No; I am sorry, I can not yield now. I will yield later.

Now, gentlemen, it will not do now, when the country is aroused over this question of taxation and expenditures, to come before you with a general statement saying that his estimates should have been reduced to the extent of $331,000,000.

I repeat, I do not know of a greater indictment that could be drawn against the President of the United States, if you permit me to say it, and his Budget than the statement contained in his message of yesterday with reference to what ought to be appropriated.

Mr. PETTENGILL. He indicts himself.

Mr. BYRNS. As my friend the gentleman from Indiana says, he indicts himself in the statement he has made. I am sure that the taxpayers, whether in his party or in mine, are going to wonder why it is that the President has been so long waking up to the real situation which confronts our country.

Mr. HASTINGS. And the Budget is given $190,000 with which to employ experts and clerical help to prepare these estimates for the President.

Mr. BYRNS. Exactly. The Budget law, as every Member of this House knows, was passed for the purpose of providing machinery by which the President might examine into every estimate submitted by the departments, and it placed upon him and upon no one else the responsibility of sending those estimates to Congress. That is the foundation of the Budget law, and the President can not escape the responsibility which rested upon him in December as well as at the present time.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. For a brief question.

Mr. BLANTON. The President could have told his Budget Bureau not to make Budget estimates for more than $2,000,000,000 and they would have been forced to comply with his will.

Mr. BYRNS. Of course. Let me tell you something else with reference to these reductions made by the Committee on Appropriations of the House. Everyone remembers that when the first bill, the agricultural bill, was reported to the House, carrying a reduction of $10,834,000 plus, the Secretary of Agriculture, a member of the President's Cabinet, and supposed to stand for him and represent his views, gave out an interview in which he criticized the Committee on Appropriations for having reduced the estimates in that amount. Then when the Interior Department bill came along, the Secretary of the Interior, generally supposed to be closer to the President than any other member of his Cabinet, gave out an interview in which he harshly criticized the committee and the Congress and in which he said they had absolutely crippled his department because they reduced his estimates in the sum of $5,600,000. Then the Secretary of War added his note of protest against the reduction in some speech he made or some letter he wrote to a paper in Missouri.

That is the cooperation your committee has received from the President's own official Cabinet in its efforts to reduce the expenditures of this Government. [Applause.] Talk to me about cooperation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. For a brief question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Is it not true that the President's Secretary of the Treasury, along with other Cabinet members, joined in the protest to the House against reducing the estimates of the Budget?

Mr. BYRNS. A number of them did so—I will not include them all, but I remember three of them in number—have uttered a criticism because of reductions made in these estimates.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will permit, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, and the heads of all departments have sent an army up here before the Appropriations Committee seeking to have their Budget estimates granted in full and in every particular.

Mr. BYRNS. Oh, yes. I wish some of you gentlemen—I know you are busy on your own committees and with your own important and responsible duties with reference to legislation pending before them, but I wish some day when you have a moment to spare you would look over these hearings and see how little help the Committee on Appropriations has received from those in the executive departments in its effort to accomplish something in the interest of the tax-paying public of the United States.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. For a brief question.

Mr. TABER. I understood the gentleman to say that the President in his message last night had suggested that we might save $700,000,000 below the Budget estimates submitted. As a matter of fact, the President stated this:

A drastic program of economy, which, including the savings already made in the Executive Budget of $369,000,000, can be increased to exceed $700,000,000 per annum.

Mr. BYRNS. I thank the gentleman for that correction. I was not absolutely certain when I stated the figures, and I will correct them before they are printed in the permanent RECORD. However, the point is that he says his own Budget estimates should be reduced by the sum of $331,000,000 from that which he submitted in December, and I submit to my good friend from New York that that in no way relieves him from the indictment which he drew for himself on yesterday.

Mr. FULLER. Why does he not tell us how that $331,000,000 can be saved?

Mr. BYRNS. I am coming to that. There is no use in trying to fool the American people. Do not forget that every man who pays taxes and every man who is suffering back home knows what is going on here, and he is not going to be misled by a lot of glittering generalities or general statements to the effect that this or that can be done.

The gentleman from Arkansas asked why the President did not tell us just where these reductions could be made. Let me tell you something. A few months ago the President sent a message in which he said he would like to have the Congress abdicate its powers and delegate to him the right to legislate in effecting consolidations and eliminating duplications. I am not going to take up your time by doing more than to refer to the fact that for three years the President sat mute, although he ought to have known, as everybody in this House and in the country knew, that a crisis was impending. That we have a deficit is not new knowledge. We have known for several years that your Government and mine was living beyond its income. Whose duty, above all, was it to sound the alarm? Whose duty was it, above all, to have said, "Stop, and let us get back to a situation where we will be able to pay our debts as we go along, without further taxing the people by the issuance of bonds and adding to our already large indebtedness"? Was anything said? Did you hear any note of alarm raised in the last Congress, which was Republican by more than 100 in the House, and there was also a Republican majority in the Senate? Did anybody say then, "Stop"? Did anybody say, "Halt"? Did anybody call attention to the fact that we were heading into the biggest deficit this country ever had in peace times? No.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. For a brief question.

Mr. McDUFFIE. On the other hand, the country was misled as to the number of unemployed and misled by figures issuing from the Treasury Department as to the actual conditions obtaining in this country.

Mr. BYRNS. I thank the gentleman from Alabama for the suggestion.

Mr. McDUFFIE. And "prosperity was just around the corner." [Laughter.]

Mr. BYRNS. Yes. As the gentleman from Alabama says, we were not only not told that we were heading into the biggest deficit this country had ever had, but, on the contrary, we were told that "prosperity was just around the corner." It was an invitation to spend rather than retrench.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. For a question.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. In the President's message he refers to his efforts in behalf of the recovery of employment and agriculture and I will ask the gentleman if he has made any concrete suggestion to that end other than that everybody buy a car while he himself bought nine for the White House and for the use of the President? [Laughter.]

Mr. BYRNS. Not that I have heard of.

Mr. BROWNING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; for a question.

Mr. BROWNING. In the President's statement that his Budget should be cut $369,000,000, does the President take into account in that statement the $625,000,000 that he has requested in authorizations since that time?

Mr. BYRNS. No; he does not.

Mr. BROWNING. Then, the Budget he has submitted, plus the items he has requested, would be far above the Budget of last year?

Mr. BYRNS. Oh, undoubtedly; by a billion dollars or more, or certainly by a very considerable sum.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I have one of the new Hoover coins—almost identical with the one used in 1928—a gold-looking coin, but not gold, that they have just gotten out for the coming campaign. It has the G. O. P. elephant on one side and Hoover written on it and gotten out as a lucky pocket piece, and it says, "Good for four years of prosperity." [Laughter.]

Mr. BYRNS. When was that issued?

Mr. BLANTON. It is something new, although practically identical with one used in 1928. It has been gotten out by Republicans for the coming campaign.

Mr. BYRNS. That is fine. It is so expressive of the reverse of the truth. [Laughter and applause.]

I want to take occasion to make this statement because I have not had the opportunity before. I was not a very important member of the Economy Committee. Unfortunately, owing to my duties on the Committee on Appropriations, I was not able to give it the time that every other Member so industrially and patriotically gave it, but I want to take this occasion to say that no man ever worked more earnestly and more courageously and more ably than did the chairman of that committee, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE] [applause], in his efforts to bring to this Congress a bill which would help to reduce the expenditures of the Government.

Every man in Congress has the right to vote his honest and conscientious convictions, and I would not for one moment undertake to question the motive of any Member of this House as to his vote upon any proposition any more than I would expect him to question mine, but I am one of those who regret that the committee's bill met the fate it did upon the floor of this House. As it left this Chamber, if the newspapers in their compilations be correct, it carried more than $42,000,000 of savings, and, therefore, I am not going to say that that bill was a wreck by any means. I am sure that every member of the committee feels that while he would like to have had it reduce expenditures as he had hoped from $200,000,000 to $250,000,000, yet the fact that it only reduced them $42,000,00 in some measure compensates the committee for the work it did.

Mr. GREEN. And in that connection the President not only purchased the automobiles referred to, but while this committee was sitting he submitted a counter program to befuddle the minds of the people and the Government workers, and, apparently, to defeat the efforts of the Economy Committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Very briefly; yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. If the economy bill was wrecked in any way, part of the cause was the President's opposition to the Army and Navy consolidation.

Mr. BYRNS. I am coming to that.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Let me first answer this question, and then I shall yield to the gentleman for a question; but I have got to ask the Members of the House to excuse me because I do not want to take up too much of your time.

Let me make this statement—and I make it deliberately and without fear of successful contradiction: When you talk about emasculating the economy program of the committee, to which the President has referred and for which he criticizes the House in defeating the committee program along with his own program, there is no man in all the United States who is more responsible for that than the President of the United States himself. [Applause.] Why do I say this? I know that a number of years ago a President of the United States recommended a consolidation of the Army and the Navy in the interest of efficiency and also in the interest of economy.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Not now. Let me get through with my thought, if you please, and then I shall yield. I want to be courteous; but please let me develop the thought that was suggested by my friend from Missouri.

It was assumed at that time, possibly erroneously, that the President, who was a member of his official family and one of the official advisers of President Harding, approved his recommendation. Certainly no one ever heard a suggestion from the then Secretary of Commerce that he was opposed to it; and many therefore thought that since the President had so strongly recommended consolidation that he would support a proposition to consolidate the Army and Navy; which, I say to you from the bottom of my heart, because I believe it, meant more in the saving of money than any other title in the economy bill. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. More saving than all the rest of them put together.

Mr. BYRNS. It would have saved not less than $50,000,000 per annum, and I verily believe $100,000,000, and some have estimated it at more than that amount.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Tennessee 30 minutes more.

Mr. BYRNS. Some of its opponents admitted that it would have saved $25,000,000. I asked the Secretary of War, when he was before the Economy Committee, if it would not save money, and he said, "Undoubtedly, it would save considerable money."

What does the President say in his message with reference to the consolidation of the War and Navy Departments? He said the savings to be made are "indeterminate but very considerable."

Why, gentlemen, who was it that defeated that consolidation? I said that the President was more responsible than anybody else for emasculating the economy program. I am speaking plainly, because I said a while ago I think the time has come when we ought to speak plainly, and I appeal to every Member of the House if it is not a fact that on last Friday and Saturday, and possibly on Thursday, one of the extrasuperfluous secretaries of the President, known generally as his political secretary, spent his time over here on the floor, buttonholing Members of his own party against it. [Applause.] If it had not been for him there would have been more votes. It was only defeated by 25 votes, and in that number were 149 gentlemen upon the Republican side of the Chamber and 61 Democrats.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I can not yield. I am sorry. I hope the gentleman will excuse me. There were 50 Republicans who voted with the 137 Democrats in favor of the consolidation.

Now you talk about emasculating the economy program. Who did it? Why was it the Secretary of the President spent at least two days exercising the privileges which came to him as an ex-Member of this House, sitting here on this floor, buttonholing Members, urging his own party to vote against that bill? If he had not exercised the power and the influence that came to him as Secretary to the President, I dare say the bill would have passed by a big majority. I shall say nothing about the propriety of such action or of Executive interference. Who emasculated it? [Applause.]

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Instead of voting for the committee plan, the President insisted on his furlough system, which the committee did not approve.

Mr. BYRNS. Absolutely, the furlough plan was injected into the program of the committee, and there was a difference of opinion as to what should be done. It was the first real division of opinion which occurred, although there were differences among Members about various proposals.

The President sent his message here in January, I think. As I said a while ago, did he tell you what consolidations he thought ought to be effected? Did he tell you what duplications should be cut out? Although repeatedly invited and urged to send to Congress a plan, the plan which he was supposed to have formulated, he failed to do so. When did he first send it? It was on the eve of the day when the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE], was about to present the plan of the Economy Committee that he invited this committee to come down to the White House and talk with him, and he then proceeded to set out his plan, which agreed with many things the committee had already considered. Why did he not tell the committee while it was sitting for six or seven weeks what that plan was? If gentlemen do not believe me, I urge them to read the record. I invite them to do so. Why did not some of the members of the President's Cabinet give us some concrete suggestion as to how we could consolidate in their own particular departments? I appeal to the record. Gentlemen know that outside of the mere general statements, without any specific or personal recommendation, the committee got practically no help from the executives until the President sent for the committee, as I have stated. Oh, Mr. Chairman, there is no use trying to fool the people. There is no excuse for undertaking to play politics in this matter. I would not be here making this speech to-day were it not for the message which the President sent up yesterday, which did the Congress, his own party and mine, a serious injustice.

Mr. BLANTON. And it ought to be stated that of the Republican leaders who led defeat against consolidation were the gentleman from New York, Mr. SNELL, the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. TILSON, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CHINDBLOM, the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. MICHENER, and also Mr. MAPES, and also the gentleman from New York, Mr. TABER. All of the Republican leaders led that assault against consolidation and helped to defeat it.

Mr. SNELL. The reason these Republicans opposed the consolidation of the Army and Navy was they are all for national preparedness and adequate national defense.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I will yield for just a question.

Mr. SCHAFER. Since the gentleman——

Mr. BYRNS. No; I want the question.

Mr. SCHAFER. Why was your economy bill defeated in the House by the Democratic Party? The gentleman should not berate the Republican Party when the House, which defeated the bill, is controlled by a big majority of Democrats.

Mr. BYRNS. Take the RECORD of last Tuesday. I appeal to it. The gentleman will find that on these various amendments I have referred to, on one of them——

Mr. BLANTON. One hundred and fifty Republicans voted against consolidation.

Mr. BYRNS. Take the amendment offered by a gentleman of your own party, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN]. The Economy Committee sought to make the exemption $1,000 in the salary cuts, and the gentleman from Illinois offered an amendment to raise the exemption to $2,500. One hundred and thirty-seven Republicans voted for that amendment, and only 101 Democrats.

Mr. SCHAFER. And a Democrat offered the amendment to take out the consolidation of the Army and Navy.

Mr. BYRNS. I do not yield to the gentleman any more. I yielded to him respectfully and courteously for one question.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, will my good friend yield to me for a question?

Mr. BYRNS. No; I can not yield to my friend from Kansas, and I would rather yield to him than anyone else. The President says, and he repeats with some degree of pride, that there was a saving made and, mark you, he calls it a saving, of $369,000,000 in the estimates for the next year below the appropriations made for this year. Let us see where the $369,000,000 saving comes from, and whether it is really a saving or not. I have referred to it several times, but, like Banquo's ghost, it rises every time we have a message from the President.

The President stated that the Budget submitted in December last provided estimated expenditures for the fiscal year 1933 that were $369,000,000 less than the estimated expenditures for the current fiscal year. These figures are correct, but the $369,000,000 is largely made up by the reduction in construction work and other nonrecurring items which more than offset any increases that are made for 1933. In a statement which was issued from the Executive on December 14 last, showing estimated expenditures, it was shown that the Budget as submitted in December contained estimated expenditures for the fiscal year 1933 for construction works of $575,000,000 compared with $780,000,000 for construction works for 1932, a decrease for 1933 under 1932 of $205,000,000. This is a part of the decrease of $369,000,000, which the President referred to in comparing 1933 expenditures with 1932 expenditures. In addition to the construction-works decreases there is a reduction in 1933 as compared to 1932 of $140,000,000 in the amounts estimated to be expended from the agricultural-marketing fund under the control of the Federal Farm Board. There is a decrease of $37,000,000 in 1933 as compared with 1932 on account of payments of awards under the settlement of war claims act and $3,000,000 on account of subscription to capital stock of Federal intermediate-credit banks. There was an estimated decrease in the amount of the postal deficiency to be paid from the general fund of the Treasury of $40,000,000. Also a decrease of $26,000,000 in refund of internal-revenue taxes illegally collected. Also a decrease of $5,000,000 on account of completion of work on the last decennial census. These decreases more than account for the $369,000,000 of reduction.

In addition to the $161,000,000 in reduction of estimates this House passed the other day the so-called economy bill, carrying, as the paper stated, a saving of over $42,000,000. That makes more than $200,000,000 that this House has reduced the expenditures for 1933 under the Budget.

To that should be added $5,000,000 which was made by the Senate on the Interior Department appropriation bill; and the other bill which went to conference this morning carries a decrease of $12,000,000. If that is considered, there is over $220,000,000 in reduction of expenditures up to this time; and there are many more to come.

It was said when the tax bill was before us that the Budget would be balanced if there was a reduction of $200,000,000. This House has more than met that requirement, because our reduction is more than $200,000,000. [Applause.] So if the Budget is not balanced, it can not be charged to the House of Representatives for its failure to reduce expenditures in the amount the House was asked to do at the time.

What is it that has caused this necessity for balancing the Budget? If I had the time, I would like to go into it. It is not only the reckless and careless expenditures for the past 10 years but it is the policy which has been pursued by the party in power during those 10 years, and everybody in the country knows it. [Applause.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. WRIGHT. With regard to the reductions made by the Budget, the gentleman has referred to the nonrecurring items, and the fact that building-construction programs were not included. Was not the balance of those reductions practically on account of reduction in commodity prices?

Mr. BYRNS. Absolutely. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman is very properly attempting to emphasize that all the departments and various bureaus are under the President of the United States, and that the President of the United States has a Budget Bureau, and that this Budget Bureau had $190,000 for the purpose of employing experts and clerical assistance. The gentleman from Tennessee therefore insists that instead of platitudinous messages being sent to the House it is the duty of the President to point out specifically where further economies should be effected.

Mr. BYRNS. I think the gentleman is entirely correct, and that is what many of us have been trying to show for the past two or three months, and that is what we did not get and never have gotten up to this time. Read the message of yesterday and find, if you can, where it specifically recommends and suggests that anything should be done. Read any of these messages for the past two or three months and find a specific recommendation or suggestion which has come to Congress asking it to do this or suggesting that it do that.

Mr. HASTINGS. Both the Congress and the country are entitled to specific recommendations.

Mr. BYRNS. Undoubtedly, and the Constitution of our country requires that Congress shall be advised from time to time upon matters pertaining to the state of the Union.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The President on economy matters is trailing along behind us all the time.

Mr. BYRNS. Absolutely. Now, the President criticized Congress in this language:

> The action of the House, which would increase governmental expenditures by $132,000,000 for road building.

Everybody knows why that bill was passed. I happened to be absent in committee when it was voted upon, but everybody knows that those who voted for that bill did so with the idea that it was going to help the unemployed back in the rural districts where these roads were to be built. That bill is pending in the Senate. But let me tell you that I spent all of this morning, up to the time Congress met, conducting hearings in the Deficiency Appropriation Committee on an estimate for increased expenditures at Boulder Dam. Of course, we all know that the President has a particular interest in that great constructive work there. I did not vote for it, but it was approved by the Congress, and, of course, will be completed, and I hope will prove all that its friends claim for it.

Mr. BLANTON. What is its new name?

Mr. BYRNS. I think they call it Hoover Dam. We were being asked this morning, within less than 24 hours after the President sent his message here criticizing Congress for voting these millions of dollars for the building of good roads, to increase the appropriations for the building of Hoover Dam from eleven million to fifteen million dollars. [Applause.] On what plea? On the plea that it ought to be done in the interest of unemployment. That is exactly the ground upon which Congress passed the road building bill which the President criticizes.

Now, that is just one of the inconsistencies, and I am wondering, when we come to consider the deficiency bill later in this session or next December if we will not find Budget estimates here asking for a great deal of additional appropriations.

I am absolutely so sold on the idea that not only economy would be gained in the amount of millions of dollars but that the efficiency of our national defense would improve that I continue to recur to the question of the consolidation of the Army and the Navy.

I am going to read to you from the President's own message what I regard as at least a partial justification of those who, like myself, supported it on the floor of this House. No one ever contended that by consolidation of the Army and Navy there was any intention to reduce the Army or reduce the Navy. No one ever contended that there was the slightest intent, as far as that consolidation was concerned, to affect the national defense in the slightest except to put the departments under one head and bring about cooperation and coordination, which everybody familiar with the subject knows does not exist at this time. The only claim that its advocates made was that it would save millions of dollars in the administrative expense of the departments without impairing in the slightest the strength and efficiency of the national defense—a position which was abundantly supported by expert testimony. The President told us in January, as an excuse for not sending to Congress his recommendations for consolidations, that if he made them public, they would meet with opposition in all bureaus and all departments, as if, as its head, he could not stop it if any member of a department sought to oppose it. He told us that was the reason he did not send it. But let us see what he wants to do and see if it does not meet the views of those of us who wanted to consolidate the Army and the Navy and put them under one man, who would be supreme in command and would not be interested in saving one bureau in the Navy to the detriment of a bureau in the Army, or vice versa, but who could pass on it in an impartial way and work those reforms which are so badly needed.

What does he say he wants to do? Among other things, he says that in the categories of economies that can be made by consolidation and reorganization and elimination of the less necessary bureaus is "munitions manufacture." That is what this proposed consolidation was to bring about, a consolidation of munitions manufacture under one head of department, and not have a Secretary of War and a Secretary of the Navy at loggerheads preventing a consolidation of these essential branches of these two departments.

"Army and Navy hospitals." That is what we all said would be brought about.

"Aviation fields." Certainly millions of dollars could be saved that way.

And other specific Army and Navy activities which may advantageously be consolidated for the purpose of economy and more effective administration.

That is the position of the President. He is for everything this consolidation proposed except elimination of the two Secretaries. He is evidently more interested in saving them than he is in bringing about this economy.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Certainly.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The peculiar thing about that message is that those words were used within a few days after effort was made on the part of the President to prevent the consolidation of the Army and the Navy.

Mr. BYRNS. Precisely. And it is interesting to note that at last he recognizes, as evidenced by the message on yesterday, to some extent the advisability of recommending to Congress and the country that some of the features of my consolidation bill should be put into effect. I had explained in support of my bill that the very recommendations which he now makes would be effected.

Mr. BLANTON. And after his Secretary of War and his Secretary of the Navy had come up here and lobbied against it, and they defeated the proposition before we got a vote on it in the House.

Mr. BYRNS. Oh, yes; they defeated it just as they defeated President Harding's proposal 10 years ago.

The President says:

The savings to be made are indeterminate but very considerable.

Do you think he means just a few millions of dollars? Of course you know he does not. He means millions and millions of dollars. [Applause.] That is what it would amount to; that is what some of these Army and Navy officers will tell you in private, because anybody who has the least business judgment or sound common sense knows that when you consolidate these great activities, it means the saving of money.

Now, gentlemen, I have talked to you longer than I intended. My time is about up. There are many other things to which I could refer. While my language may have been possibly a little frank, I mean no disrespect to anyone, but I for one am not willing to let anyone criticize the House of Representatives for what it has done in its effort to serve the people. I want to ask you now, and I want you to take it to your hearts and answer the question to yourselves, take every message that the President has sent here since he sent his Budget message and see if you find there one specific recommendation as to any particular amount of money that could be saved? It can not be found.

Oh, it is easy to talk generalities; it is easy to say "reduce expenditures"; it is easy to say that if you do not do it, the country is going to suffer greatly. It is easy to say to somebody else what they ought to do. But when one tells you that something ought to be done, why does he not tell you what he would do if he were in your place? [Applause.] That is what I am complaining about. Since the transmission of these estimates, so far as I know, the executive departments have been of very little, if any, help to Congress in its effort to make these reductions.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Outside of the message being just ridiculous political bunk, where is there a constructive suggestion in the President's message that the Democrats in the House of Representatives have not already been trying to accomplish?

Mr. BYRNS. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that I fail to find any.

Mr. BLANTON. And I am speaking of the Democrats in the House, and not of the 150 Republicans who slaughtered the proposed economy consolidations.

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; I know. I am not criticizing my Republican friends. I know, of course, how these things go here in Congress. We happen to have a Republican President. I have not in my heart the desire to criticize them for any vote they cast in his support, but I do highly commend those Republicans who voted their convictions on these economy measures regardless of the President's position. But I do not think that Republican Members are justified in criticizing a Democratic House for what some have called the wreckage of the economy bill, when every RECORD will show that in every instance a much greater number of Republicans than Democrats voted to wreck it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Tennessee two additional minutes.

Mr. BYRNS. Something has been said about the President's own efforts to economize in his own official household. I do not care to take that up. The Budget does not send to the House any estimates with reference to White House expenditures. Mention has been made of his secretaries. I think he has three or four, something no other President ever enjoyed. I saw in the paper the other day where nine automobiles, large limousines, were purchased to replace others. Everybody knows, of course, that each one of these secretaries has to be provided with a limousine and a chauffeur at the expense of the Government.

The appropriations for personal services at the White House for 1933 will be the same as those for 1932. The President did not ask for a reduction and the committee showed him the courtesy of appropriating the amount which he requested. The appropriations for the White House have increased greatly since 1915, when a Democrat was President, and I shall file a statement showing these increases year by year since that time. The extraordinary expenses for the years 1927 and 1930 were caused by unusual repairs and extensions. [Applause.]

The President, in his message of yesterday, said this:

The Government can not be dictated to by organized minorities.

May I respectfully suggest that he has not so much to fear from organized minorities as he has from the great organized majority in November. [Applause.]

I append hereto statements showing the reductions made by the Committee on Appropriations in the estimates of the President. Also reductions made under appropriations for 1932 and the White House appropriations from the year 1915 to 1932, inclusive.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS]. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with considerable interest, and I might say some amusement, to the statements just made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. I have asked for this time in view of the fact that I am the only Member on the Republican side to whom he saw fit to refer by name in his 1-hour statement.

Early in this session the President asked for authority and offered to take the responsibility for handling the economic situation and the reducing of expenditures, but the Democratic majority in this House, under the leadership of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and others, refused to give that authority and responsibility to the President. They assumed it for themselves. They have failed miserably in meeting that situation, and now they are trying to blame the President for their own incompetency, mismanagement, and lack of cohesion and leadership in this House. [Applause.]

The President has been blamed for the drought; he has been blamed for grasshoppers; he has been blamed for rebellions and overthrows and troubles in the countries of the world; and now he is blamed for the lack of leadership that exists on the Democratic side of this House, and that by those Democratic leaders themselves. [Applause.]

Let us see what we have. We have this strange situation, if I analyze the speech of the gentleman from Tennessee correctly, that the Democrats having assumed the responsibility for the economy program, having failed to put through their own program, and having failed to put through the President's program, now want to make the President responsible for the situation.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] says there should be no politics in a situation of this kind, in particular a situation dealing with the economies of the country. On the 8th of February, 1932, an article appeared in the Washington Evening Star in which the gentleman from Illinois, the majority leader [Mr. RAINEY], is quoted as saying:

> The demands for relief in the country might offset the millions of dollars saved by the Democratic House through the appropriation bills.

So that the injection of politics into the matter of appropriations and in the saving of appropriations was made by the Democratic leader of this House [Mr. RAINEY]. Within a week of the time Mr. RAINEY made that statement the Democratic organization of the House brought in and put through this House a bill proposing to increase the expenditures of the Government of the United States $132,000,000.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] voted for it. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, was on the floor that afternoon, but he neither raised his voice in favor of the bill nor in opposition to it. He paired on it and did not vote. That is the record of the leadership of the Democratic side on that matter.

The gentleman from Tennessee quoted from the President's message of yesterday regarding the possibility of saving $700,000,000. He was wrong only $369,000,000 in his quotation of figures from the President's message. While he may correct his speech in the statement that goes to the printer, the fact remains that he misquoted the President and stands charged on the floor of this House either with not having read what the President said, not having understood it, or not caring to properly interpret it to the House. I want to read now that which the gentleman from Tennessee misquoted or misinterpreted. The President said this:

A drastic program of economy which, including the savings already made in the Executive Budget of $369,000,000, can be increased to exceed $700,000,000 per annum.

The gentleman from Tennessee, in his interpretation of the President's statement, left out of the President's message these words:

Including the savings already made in the Executive Budget of $369,000,000.

And attempts to make the President say that a drastic program of economy can be increased to exceed $700,000,000 per annum, without regard to and in addition to the President's Budget reductions of $369,000,000 over last year's expenditures. What did the President say in explanation of that statement?

Considering that the whole Federal expenditure, except about $1,700,000,000, is for uncontrollable obligations, this would represent an unprecedented reduction. Such a program, to accomplish its purpose, must embrace the rejection of all measures that increase expenditures unless they be of undoubted emergency.

There is no misunderstanding about that. The President has no control over that except the right of veto, and may it be said that Republican Presidents have vetoed over $1,000,000,000 of authorizations which the Congress has passed in these last few years? Then the President said:

The reduction in appropriations now pending below the figures as submitted in the Executive Budget on December 9, last.

Those are the expenditures which the gentleman from Tennessee refers to and about which the President has repeatedly told the Congress that if we can reduce his Budget figures well and good, he is for it. So there is no blame on the President's part there. Everyone here knows that the Budget is made up in the summer months and that we are now considering a Budget that is at least six or more months old. The gentleman from Tennessee has stated privately a number of times, and I think once on this floor, that the President expressed approval of reductions of Budget estimates if they could be made.

Then the President said:

A reconsideration of the legislation covering those economy projects which require repeal or amendment to the laws and an effective grant of authority to the Executive to reorganize and consolidate and eliminate unnecessary Government bureaus and establishments.

There you have a large part of the $331,000,000 that the President includes in his $700,000,000 request, and there again the President has repeatedly asked the Congress—I am told, in 21 different messages this session—to pass legislation which would authorize the Executive to make those savings. In the economy bill the Democratic House, controlled by the Democratic Party, has refused to give the President that authority. Then the gentleman from Tennessee, himself one of that Democratic majority, and a member and former chairman of the Economy Committee, blames the President for the fact that the Congress has not given him the power he has asked. Congress has not granted the power to the President that the President asked in order to make those savings. Congress has not authorized those savings. The President can not make them without that authority. The gentleman from Tennessee has aided in denying the President that authority, and then attempts to shift to the President the burden of the failure.

Some reference has been made here to the consolidation of the Army and the Navy, and out of all the things that the gentleman referred to with respect to the votes on the economy bill, he attempts to place on the Republican minority in this House the responsibility of furnishing the votes to put through a Democratic program. He fails to mention the fact that the elimination of that item was on the motion of a Democrat, that if on any one of those votes the Democratic organization of this House had been able to control its own votes they would have put through their own economy program, and yet, here again, like the drought and the grasshoppers, they are trying to blame the President for it.

I want to now specifically refer to the savings in appropriations that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] has referred to.

I have not yet analyzed the appropriations for the Department of War. The gentleman claims savings of $161,000,000 under Budget figures. This includes the War Department appropriation bill, which is not included in the figures that I now have. Up until this bill came through the total reduction in appropriations under Budget figures by the House Committee on Appropriations was approximately $130,000,000. The gentleman from Tennessee claims all of this as a saving to the taxpayer and criticized me because I have said on the floor of the House that not to exceed forty or fifty million dollars of this amount was actual saving to the taxpayer. The gentleman from Tennessee quoted me erroneously. I never gave them credit for saving that much, and I do not now give them credit for it, because the figures are that the actual savings to the taxpayer in all the appropriation bills that have been reported by the Committee on Appropriations to the House up to date, with the exception of the War Department bill, are $38,995,142. This much money is saved. Let us give credit where credit is due. It belongs largely to the Committee on Appropriations of the House, of which the gentleman from Tennessee is the distinguished chairman, but let us be honest about it in telling the country what are the facts as to the amount.

Out of this great total that the gentleman tells you about, $69,111,900, or more than half of it, is a reduction which will force supplemental or deficiency estimates at a later date, where expenditures are definitely required by law, and the curtailment or postponement of such activities is not within the control of the President or anybody in administrative control. In this $69,000,000 are largely three great figures. Fifty million dollars was taken from the Veterans' Administration on loans on adjusted-service certificates and $19,000,000 was taken from appropriations for public roads. None of it represents the saving of a penny to the taxpayer.

Then there is also a reduction in items entailing further or supplemental or deficiency estimates or curtailment, through postponement, of the current rate of expenditure, but where no ultimate saving is accomplished and where a slowing up of the rate of progress is not contemplated or desired by any indication of the Congress.

Appropriations in this class total a reduction of $18,314,100.

Then there is a reduction made possible only by the assertion in the appropriation acts of language suspending or restricting the operation of organic law. These reductions amount to $2,561,563. So let me repeat that out of all the $130,000,000 that the Committee on Appropriations has reported up to the time the present bill was introduced as savings over Budget figures there has been but $38,995,000 of it that is actual saving of money to the Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an abridged tabulation upon which these figures are based.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MCMILLAN). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

STATEMENT OF AMOUNTS OF BUDGET ESTIMATES FOR 1933, THE AMOUNTS REPORTED BY THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS, AND THE AMOUNTS OF THE REDUCTIONS CLASSIFIED IN THE FOLLOWING FOUR GROUPS

(1) Reductions which will force supplemental or deficiency estimates at a later date—that is, where expenditures are definitely required by law and the curtailment or postponement of activities is not within administrative control—$69,111,900.

(2) Reductions entailing either a future supplemental or deficiency estimate or the curtailing, through postponement, of the current rate of expenditure, but where no ultimate saving is accomplished and where an actual slowing of the rate of progress is evidently not contemplated or desired by Congress, $18,314,100.

(3) Reductions made possible only by the insertion in the appropriation acts of language suspending or restricting the application of organic law, $2,561,563.

(4) Reductions which represent bona fide savings (including indefinite postponements) without suspending or restricting the application of organic law as distinguished from classes (1) and (2), $38,995,142.

Permanent and indefinite appropriations are not included in this tabulation.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have followed the gentleman from Tennessee during the last seven years I have been a member of the Committee on Appropriations, many, many times when I have believed he was right, and I want to read now, for his own benefit, some of the things that on some occasions he has told the House, in order that it may be understood that I am not following an uncharted course and that in the position I have taken in discussing these appropriations I have been following the leadership of the chairman of my committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

On the 7th of June, 1924, he is quoted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on page 11284, as pointing out all of the various cooperative appropriations for public roads, and he points out the fact that the Congress that session had not appropriated all the money that was authorized for public roads, and that the unexpended balances of the Democratic administration therefor had been used, and then he said:

Unless deficiency appropriations are made, the work on road constructions will be greatly delayed, if not altogether suspended in some of the States.

Back during my first term in this Congress the gentleman from Tennessee condemned that which I now condemn; that is, a claiming of savings to the country when no savings are actually made to the Treasury.

The gentleman from Tennessee says there should be no politics in this, and yet there has never been a closing of a session of Congress during the time he has been the ranking minority member of the Committee on Appropriations when he has not made partisan politics out of the appropriation bills, and the statements I am reading now are statements that the gentleman from Tennessee has made at different times at the close of the Congresses.

On the 3d of March, 1927, page 5602, the gentleman criticized the President for not asking for all the funds that were needed, as he alleged, in the regular Budget, and then asking for deficiency appropriations, and then referred to it as "a deceptive policy" and then alleged:

In the meantime the President gets credit for a saving which does not exist.

The gentleman from Tennessee is now claiming to the country and asking credit for savings which do not now exist.

He wants the country to believe between now and election that the Democratic Party is saving the taxpayers of the country multiplied millions. We are going to be met next fall with deficiency appropriations to make up a part of this balance he now claims we are saving, that which he alleged in March, 1927, was "a deceptive policy."

Now, here is another on the 30th of June, 1922, before I became a Member of Congress. The gentleman from Tennessee made a statement with reference to General Dawes, then Director of the Budget, in which he says the statement issued showed that the boast of saving hundreds of millions of dollars were mere "paper savings," and he proceeded to condemn it. The paper saving the gentleman from Tennessee then pointed out was the fact that there had been a reduction in appropriations for public roads, and he said this:

That for that sort of reduction we submit Congress can claim no credit for economy.

He further said that if the reduction in the amount for the construction of good roads should serve to impede or delay improvement to highways such action would be subject to criticism.

Now, when I voice the same criticism regarding public-road appropriations that the gentleman then made the gentleman from Tennessee has seen fit to reprimand me publicly and privately and on the floor of the House.

Again, on the 4th of March, 1925, which you will note was the last day of Congress—and probably it was in an extension of remarks—this was the last day of my first term in Congress, and, of course, I was finding out those men whom I could follow.

There again the gentleman commented upon appropriations, and he said this:

While continuing appropriations are sometimes unavoidable, it is the hope that this practice will not become a fixed policy. The intent of the Budget system is that appropriations for fiscal years shall be readily ascertainable, and where appropriations are made for one year and permitted to lap over into another year, this is impossible. Equally objectionable is the policy of making supplemental appropriations in a deficiency bill for a fiscal year which is to follow, and the Budget should have the necessities of the various activities of the Government for the fiscal year for which appropriations are to be made sufficiently well in hand at the time the estimates are made, so as to avoid this. Deficiency bills should not carry supplemental appropriations for an ensuing fiscal year except in cases where an unavoidable mistake has been made in the original estimate or where an unexpected emergency has arisen or Congress has passed an act subsequent to the estimate requiring increased appropriations. This is important, because appropriations in deficiency bills are not usually given consideration in a survey of the amounts appropriated for any one fiscal year.

How true that is to the situation now. Sixty-nine million dollars of the alleged savings claimed by the gentleman from Tennessee that Congress must appropriate at a later date; and the gentleman from Tennessee is claiming credit for that now.

And because I charged the other day that it had the effect of deceiving the public, and that later on when these things were made up Congress would not notice it, I was reprimanded by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Yet back in March, 1925, he himself pointed out the unfairness of that course.

Again, on page 5558 of the same RECORD, let me read this:

Thus it will be seen that more than 97 per cent of the estimated reduction in expenditures for 1926 over 1925 are either automatic reductions or a deferred appropriation, and can not be claimed or classed as an economy on the part of the administration.

The gentleman from Tennessee criticizes me when I have repeatedly pointed out on the floor of the House that he can not claim economies for deferred appropriations. Yet this afternoon he repeated the old claim that they are making a saving to the taxpayers by deferred appropriations. And again:

With all due respect, this statement is calculated to create a wrong impression as to the actual economy effected under this administration.

I have been contending for an honest, fair statement of fact to the Congress and to the country regarding these alleged savings. I quote again the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]:

That the reduction of the cost of ordinary peace-time activities of the Government is essential for the relief of the people from their present burdens of taxation, and it is the acid test of true economy.

Applying that rule to the case made by the gentleman from Tennessee, to which he referred to-day, only $38,000,000 of it is a "true economy" by the "acid test" which he himself laid down. In order that I may not be unfair to him I am going to try to quote all of his statements on these matters. This statement that he made on the 3d day of March, 1923, which, of course, again was the last day of the Congress, refers to President Harding's announcement that there had been a reduction in the deficit in the Treasury, and said that the President frankly admitted a part of it was due to increased revenues, and then the following:

His other statements with reference to alleged reductions in expenditures and to administrative economy, I regret to say, are misleading, because the reductions for which he takes credit are not reductions in the annual recurring expenditures of the Government, but such as they are grow out of the manipulation of revolving funds and the postponement of expenditures, as in the case of the Emergency Fleet Corporation and the construction of post roads, respectively.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, the House is in disorder, and I make the point of order to that effect.

Mr. SIMMONS. Perhaps the gentleman from New York will excuse this aside, but it is quite evident that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] does not like to have anybody read his remarks on the floor of the House, and it is quite evident also that some of the things that I am saying do not please my Democratic friends.

Then again in the extension of his remarks the gentleman made this statement, referring again to the $19,000,000 road item that I talked about on the floor of the House. He there was admitting a postponement of expenditures for public roads, and says:

The third item, the estimated reduction of expenditures which needs to be considered, is that of construction of rural post roads. The original estimate was for $126,000,000. In the January 15, 1923, estimate this is reduced to $90,000,000. In other words, some of the States will not cooperate in road construction and others are not cooperating fully, so that the amount now estimated for expenditures on post roads is $36,000,000 less than originally estimated.

And I want the gentleman from Tennessee to listen to this, because it is something that I have said again and again, and I quote now from his remarks:

There is no economy or retrenchment in this. It is simply a postponed expenditure which will be a charge on the Treasury in the future.

There are a number of other statements all the way through all of the gentleman's speeches. For instance, I commend to the gentleman from Tennessee his own remarks, as follows:

Real economies in government are reflected in reduced taxation. This is the question in which the people are vitally interested. The people are not so much interested in methods of Government bookkeeping, the manipulation of revolving funds, and statements of "paper savings." What they are vitally interested in is the question of whether or not there has been any actual reduction of expenditures in the ordinary annual recurring expenses of the Government.

Let me repeat again, I think the thanks of the country are due to the Committee on Appropriations for the retrenchment of expenditures that have been made by that committee.

The President himself in his message yesterday praises those retrenchments, and asks for more of them; but let us be honest, let us be fair with the country, let us not claim savings that are not being made, let us not claim savings to the Treasury that are not reflected in reduced taxes to the American people. Up to date the Committee on Appropriations is entitled to credit for almost $39,000,000 actual saving to the taxpayer under the Budget figure. The President has given that credit and this House has given that credit and the committee is entitled to it, and, using the words of the gentleman from Tennessee himself, to claim more than $39,000,000 as a saving to the taxpayers is a "deceptive policy." That is not "true economy," according to the "acid test" which he himself has repeatedly laid down on the floor of this House.

Mr. Chairman, it is possible that during the afternoon I shall be able to get an analysis of the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill along the line of the same brackets that I have used in the other statement; and if I am able to do that between now and the printing of the RECORD to-night, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks by including that analysis in my statement. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER].

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped to say something immediately following the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. The gentleman suggests that there should be no politics in appropriation matters. We are now considering an appropriation bill. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the gentleman appears in two capacities on the floor of this House. First, the gentleman appears as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Committee, and at other times the gentleman appears as chairman of the great Committee on Appropriations. It is sad to note that every time the President of the United States sends a message to Congress the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], in his capacity as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, gains the floor and then, in his capacity as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Committee, proceeds with a tirade which amounts to nothing more nor less than a confession and avoidance of everything in the President's message.

Now, the gentleman has delivered one of those speeches on every occasion during this session when the President of the United States has sent a message. I would ask the membership of the House to get the gentleman's speech, read it, check it up, and to visualize, if you will, the gentleman from Tennessee, pacing back and forth, delivering the same speech time and time again, as an apology and excuse. The gentleman told us to-day he would not be on the floor to-day were it not for the President's message of yesterday.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman did not have time when I asked him to yield to me. The gentleman said he was here but for one purpose, and that was to answer the President's message.

I ask the Members if the gentleman has made one single constructive suggestion? The only thing the gentleman from Tennessee did was to refer to water that has gone over the wheel. The gentleman said: "Why had not the President of the United States discovered this condition three years ago? Why has he not done something?" I will tell the gentleman from Tennessee the people of the country are not interested in why the President did not do something three years ago.

Mr. BYRNS. Now, the gentleman has referred to me. Will he not be kind enough to yield?

Mr. MICHENER. Surely.

Mr. BYRNS. Does not the gentleman think it would be a better criticism of my speech if he pointed out wherein I was in error in the statements I made rather than indulging in a personal criticism?

Mr. MICHENER. I will be glad to do that.

Mr. BYRNS. All the gentleman has done is to personally criticize me. The people of the country are not interested in that.

Mr. MICHENER. That is it exactly. People are not interested in personal criticism. They are not interested in the kind of speech the gentleman made on the floor to-day. Not a single constructive sentence escaped his lips; entirely a criticism of the President of the United States.

I will tell you the people of the country are not interested in why President Hoover did not do something three years ago. What the country is interested in to-day is why does not the Democratic Party and why does not the gentleman from Tennessee, who consumed one hour and two minutes of the time of this House to-day criticizing the President, do something.

Mr. BYRNS. We tried to do more, and the gentleman and his side would not permit us to do it.

Mr. MICHENER. What have you tried to do? The first message of the President was urging that something be done. He asked that he be given authority to do something. Immediately the gentleman from Tennessee introduced a bill providing for an Economy Committee, a resolution for an Economy Committee. That fell down before it got started. The gentleman was afraid to permit the President of the United States to effect economies which the President said he would effect if he was given authority, because the gentleman from Tennessee was afraid there might be some little party advantage, and as a result we got the Economy Committee. It was to do something by April 14. It did nothing. Then later it held hearings. They worked night and day. They attempted to find out something, but they found they did not know where they were and that they could not accomplish anything.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan five additional minutes.

Mr. MICHENER. He then asked that they might be given more time. They took time. They did not get anywhere. The President sent another message urging them to do something, and then they said, "Mr. President, what should we do?" The President said, "Come down and I will help you all I can." The President then gave suggestions. They brought in their program and they failed, and what is the Economy Committee doing to-day?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes. I yield to the chairman of the Economy Committee to answer the question as to what that committee is doing to-day.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. MICHENER. If the gentleman will answer that, I will yield to him.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman stated that the Economy Committee was advised by the President, which is true, but the President had sent messages here dealing with generalities, after the Economy Committee was formed, and the Economy Committee promptly wrote him, asking him for some specific suggestions, and then he invited the committee to the White House. We sat with him. We took many of his suggestions, as the gentleman knows. We brought in here what we thought was a nonpartisan effort and presented it to the House, but, as the gentleman also knows, we did not have the cooperation of the President to carry through that entire program.

Mr. MICHENER. Oh, the gentleman from Alabama well knows that the gentleman from Michigan now addressing the House stood by the gentleman's committee more than did the majority's own side. [Applause.] We followed our leaders here and stood by the gentleman in every effort, with one exception, and that was the exception of the consolidation of the Army and the Navy. The leaders on this side told us, and we all believed, there should be certain consolidations as suggested in the President's message, and as suggested to the Economy Committee by the President at the time, and it is the belief of those on this side who opposed the consolidation on this floor, and it is the belief of the President of the United States who opposed that consolidation when talking to the Economy Committee, that there would be no economy if that kind of consolidation were brought about. So there is no difference as to the question as to whether or not there should be consolidation. Certain consolidations of the Army and Navy will prove beneficial and effective. On the other hand, two great departments like these can not be consolidated in 20 minutes on the floor of this House.

You can not do it any more than you can write a tax bill. You can not do it any more than you can eliminate useless bureaus and things of that kind on the floor of this House.

The gentleman from Alabama, the chairman of the Economy Committee, I am sure, has learned by this time that if economies are to be effected, and if consolidations are to be effected, that authority must be given to somebody, some individual, or some executive who has courage and who will not be controlled by organized minorities or groups. Put him in that position and he will find some way, some means to bring about these consolidations, where they can act independently, and that is the only way this is going to be brought about.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Is the gentleman speaking of the next President of the United States?

Mr. MICHENER. Possibly that is the reason why you refuse to let President Hoover proceed. Politics is ever present in the mind of the chairman of the Economy Committee. I heard your good friend the former Governor of New York, Mr. Smith, over the radio the other night criticize most severely the kind of tactics that the Democrats in this House have been playing on the floor to-day, as evidenced by the speech of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. They certainly should not criticize the Republican Party. No party is to blame for conditions in the country to-day, but, as former Governor Smith said, what the country wants is constructive legislation.

I agree with Governor Smith, and the country agrees with Governor Smith.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CLAGUE. I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. MICHENER. Now we are wasting time. As I said, the gentleman from Tennessee talked an hour and two minutes, and what did he say? Let us not forget that for every minute that passes, this country at present is running behind $5,000. During the time that the gentleman from Tennessee criticized and found fault the country ran behind more than $300,000. These figures are appalling, $7,000,000 a day.

Mr. Chairman, I say it is time that we did something. The country demands something more than talk.

Call the majority party together, have that party stand with your majority committee when it comes in here, and put through legislation. If the gentleman can not do that, let us do what the President in the White House says we should do.

Mr. McDUFFIE. What?

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman from Alabama support a resolution, which we will introduce if you will support it, giving the President of the United States authority to make these savings and these consolidations, and save the Government of the United States this next year the $600,000,000 which he mentions in his message? Will the gentleman do that?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I will answer the gentleman. In the bill presented to the House we proposed, and as it passed the House it carried, a provision that does give the President that authority. Furthermore, the President said to the committee that there were many of these consolidations that he could make within 30 days, and yet in his message he said it would take him nearly a year to do it. I wish to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. MICHENER. What is your question?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Why did not the President send that same message when he sent his Budget to this House? [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. Oh, there it goes again! Water over the wheel! Why did you not do something 10 years ago?

The President has said this same thing in a dozen messages. Check them up. After every message your answer is, "Why did he not do it before?" The gentleman is shrewd. He is a good lawyer. He says that in the bill which just passed there are "broad" powers. Oh, that is a deceptive word. There are "broad" powers, but the gentleman well knows that the powers therein contained are not sufficient to permit the President to do that which he says he will do if Congress will give him the authority.

I see that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] has come back on the floor.

Mr. BYRNS. I have been here all the time.

Mr. MICHENER. He wants to effect economy when he is acting as chairman of the Appropriations Committee, but he says little about economy when he is talking politics as the chairman of the national congressional committee. I ask the gentleman to answer this question if he really wants results: If we will bring in a resolution to-morrow giving the President of the United States the authority which he craves and which he says will effect these economies, will the Democrats who control legislation on the floor of the House bring up that resolution and will the Democrats support it?

Mr. BYRNS. I want to say—since the gentleman asks me, as he did the gentleman from Alabama—that the bill which passed the other day carried a provision giving to the President the very authority to which the gentleman refers, with authorization to send it to Congress for its approval. Let me ask the gentleman a question since he has asked me one.

Mr. MICHENER. You have the power and you have the votes.

Mr. BYRNS. We have a majority of but 5 or 6 and when 146 Members of the gentleman's party vote against us how in the name of Heaven can you hold the Democrats responsible.

Mr. MICHENER. We gave you enough Republican votes—and you know it, JOE BYRNS—to put every economy proposed in the bill, but the gentleman did not get enough votes from his own party to put in a single economy provision. I leave that to the chairman of the Economy Committee, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MCDUFFIE].

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. BYRNS. I want to ask my friend, EARL MICHENER, this question and I want a frank answer. Of course, the gentleman is taking a great delight in criticizing me and criticizing my friend from Alabama.

Mr. MICHENER. Not personally.

Mr. BYRNS. I understand it is friendly criticism, and we enjoy it as much as the gentleman himself; but we are not getting anywhere with that. I want to ask the gentleman this question—something I have propounded a number of times: Why did not the President, if he had any plan for consolidation, submit it to Congress and the country so as to give the Congress and the country a chance to know just what he proposed? [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. What I have said already answers the gentleman, because that is just the whole speech which the gentleman made to-day. It is water gone over the wheel. JOE BYRNS, I do not care whether the President of the United States made a mistake a year ago or two years ago or not. I am not interested in that. The American people are not interested in whether or not President Hoover should have had superforesight. No man in the world had such foresight or knew what was coming. The people of the country are not interested to-day as to whether or not he had that foresight; but they are interested in this fact—that the country faces this depression, that the Federal Government is spending this vast amount of money, that we must reduce expenditures, and they are going to hold somebody responsible for it. It is our duty here, in the name of God, to quit talking about what has gone by. We should look to the future. We should look forward. I realize it is always the wounded bird that flutters. The message hit the mark, the fluttering is pathetic.

Mr. BYRNS. Let me ask the gentleman one more question, and may I say this, that I do not blame the gentleman in the slightest for wanting to forget the past and talk about the future [applause], but I do want to ask the gentleman this: The gentleman is one of the leaders on his side, and a good one, and I ask him why, if we could save all this money by consolidation, the gentleman's party did not do it in the last Congress when his party had a majority of over 100 in this House? [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. The only answer to that is——

Mr. BYRNS. "Let us forget it; it is behind us."

Mr. MICHENER. There has been talk about consolidations and reductions in the cost of government for years. The actual running expense of the Government was less in 1931 than it was in 1925, but veterans' legislation and other activities have increased our Budget. This is no fault of the President or of the Republican Party. The gentleman from Tennessee has been ranking member on the Appropriations Committee and on many occasions he has pleaded on the floor of the House to increase Budget estimates submitted by the President. In days of prosperity the Government, as well as the individual, is profligate. These bureaus have grown, and now we have reached the stage where it is difficult to raise tax money. The Congress realizes this state, yet because of these organized minorities, as demonstrated during the consideration of the economy bill, we are unable to function. That is, our Democratic leadership in the House can not agree on a program and can not muster enough Democratic votes to carry through any kind of a program. On the Republican side of the aisle we have made every effort to expedite any legislation looking toward economy. The gentleman from Tennessee, as Democratic congressional committee leader, presents a sad spectacle in his feeble effort to criticize the President's message. Of course, his heart is not back of his effort. The whip and spur of his party leaders are the things that compel him to rush onto the floor every time the President asks for action. These messages get action in the way of wails, sobs, and criticism. The country will thoroughly understand from the gentleman's speech the attitude of his party; and if these messages with punch would only come oftener, so that an aroused public opinion might assert itself, possibly the Democratic organization in the House might impress upon its members the necessity for something besides political speeches.

The fellow who has to pay the taxes back home demands relief. He is not momentarily interested in whether this tax burden was created because of the policies pursued in the Wilson administration or in the Hoover administration. That kind of talk might be interesting on the stump, out in the district in the campaign, but it will not save the farmer or the factory from the tax collector. It will not start the wheels of prosperity or inspire the confidence of the people. The demonstration of this House during the consideration of the tax bill and the economy bill has created in the minds of the public a general distrust in the ability of the House to function. Indeed, after the tax bill was ruined the distinguished Speaker, in a last-minute rally, took the floor and controlled his followers to such an extent that we were able to get the bill out of the House, where no more damage could be done, and I shall not be surprised if again in this crisis it becomes necessary for the Speaker, within the next day or two, to take the floor in an effort to stabilize his shattered forces.

The pity of it is that he does not take the floor and rally the cohorts at a time when a united front means much to legislation. This message of the President sounds in a way like Theodore Roosevelt. It has been called a lecture, and I am sure that the country feels that it is high time that the President wields the "big stick"; and the most gratifying thing about it is that the truth of his statements seems to have penetrated; and now I say to my Democratic friends, let us look forward and not backward. Let us plan for the future and be constructive. I realize that as a minority party you have been criticizing so long that you have acquired the habit, and we all sympathize with you in your difficulty, and hope that you will listen to the sound advice and heed the courageous words of that splendid man in the White House, who is conscientiously trying to bring about economies in government.

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of patience to the speech of the alleged economy leader, our good friend the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of this House. The gentleman indicated we had saved about $42,000,000 in the economy bill as it passed the House. That saving did not benefit the taxpayers and the Treasury, because the next day, with his aid and support, you put an obligation on the Federal Treasury of about $68,000,000 in the Muscle Shoals bill. This was all right from the standpoint of the economy experts from Alabama and Tennessee, because it provided for Muscle Shoals work on the Tennessee River, which was of great benefit to the people of the States of Alabama and Tennessee, from which the gentlemen hail.

I opposed the resolution creating this demagogic political alleged Economy Committee, and I stated why at the time. The Democratic Party can not deny responsibility, because it has a majority in this House; and you told the people of the Nation that, if they put the Democratic Party in the majority in the House and in the Senate, with one magic sweep of the wand you would solve all the problems and bring back prosperity.

You have a majority on the committee in which tax legislation must originate, and you could not function there, and you admitted you could not.

You have a majority on the committee in which tariff legislation must originate and, notwithstanding your vicious attacks on existing tariff rates, you have not passed one reduction or repeal in committee or in the House.

You have a majority of the members on the Appropriations Committee and, with the record of your chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], he ought to resign as chairman of that committee; and every member of the Appropriations Committee who has been following some of his ill-advised leadership, be they Democrats or be they Republicans, should resign from that committee.

Just imagine the position taken by the chairman of the great Appropriations Committee of this House. His committee holds extensive hearings on great supply bills, studies the matters day in and day out, reports a bill to the House, which is controlled by a Democratic majority. The Members of the House spend days and days in careful consideration of the recommendations of the committee under general debate and the 5-minute rule and pass the bill on to the other body. This other body, in the name of economy, cripples very essential services of the Government and reduces the total of that great appropriation bill $5,000,000 and incorporates some 186 far-reaching amendments. Then this Member, who is a leader of the Democratic Party, the chairman of your Appropriations Committee [Mr. BYRNS], comes before the House, with a majority of Democratic Members, and under a suspension of the rules, where there is 20 minutes allotted for consideration and discussion of the important bill, you reverse yourselves and swallow the entire bill as it came from the Senate and make this House a rubber stamp for that body.

The gentleman could not have been right both times. Either he was wrong when he asked you to suspend the rules and swallow that appropriation bill for the Interior Department in the form passed by the Senate or he was wrong in the first instance when he recommended to this House, controlled by the Democrats, the bill as originally recommended by the Appropriations Committee.

So I say to you that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNES], in his handling of the Interior appropriation bill, has convicted himself and the Democratic majority of the Appropriations Committee of gross ignorance and inefficiency and incapability; and in the name of justice, in order to protect the sacred rights of this House, if you please, in order to maintain our form of government wherein we have a House of Representatives and a Senate, and in the name of decency, instead of making political, economy speeches on the floor of the House, he should resign as chairman of the Appropriations Committee and the Democratic Party should request him to resign.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Wisconsin five additional minutes.

Mr. SCHAFER. In the past, in the other body and in statements in the press, the Democratic leaders have bitterly attacked the Republicans for spending money and have called attention to the great increases in appropriations under a Republican administration, with a resulting Republican deficit. You Democrats fail to realize that when your last Democratic administration went into power there was about $1,000,000,000 of national debt, and when you came out and turned the reins of government over to the Republican Party, after the American people had risen in revolt against your leadership, we had a national debt of over twenty-nine and one-half billion dollars.

Yes; we now have a Treasury deficit, but the total of the interest and the sinking-fund payments and the care and treatment of World War veterans amounts to over $2,000,000,000, or almost the entire amount of the annual deficit. This has not resulted from a Republican-administration activity but from the World War, conducted under a Democratic administration.

Oh, yes; you now attack extravagance and increased cost of government, but the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], as late as January 20 and January 23, 1925, as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show, led a fight on the floor of the House to increase the Budget estimate for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce over $390,000, and was not entirely successful in that attempt.

If you go through the RECORD you will see that this same gentleman led other fights for increases amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars, many of which were unsuccessful, but he followed them up with attempts to have divisions and with demands for teller votes.

In speaking of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, which the Democratic Party now desires to assassinate in the name of economy—a false economy—as late as 1925, January 20, page 2237, Mr. BYRNS stated, and I quote him briefly, as follows:

> I have always, I think my colleagues will admit, stood for strict economy in the appropriations which are made for governmental activities, but I recognize that it is sometimes false economy to fail to make a sufficient appropriation and hamper some very important activity of the Government which is rendering a great service to the people of the United States. There is sometimes truth in the old adage of "Penny-wise and pound-foolish."
> In my judgment, the appropriation which is carried in this bill for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce is not sufficient to enable that bureau to properly perform its functions in fostering and promoting our domestic and foreign commerce. If you gentlemen will take the pains to read the hearings—and they are very interesting—and the statements made by Dr. Julius Klein ,the very able and efficient director of that bureau, and Mr. Secretary Hoover, a man of great ability and wide vision, I am satisfied that you will come to the same conclusion to which I have come after reading those hearings and making an investigation as to the work being done by the bureau.

That was not a Republican Member coming into the well of the House and eulogizing Mr. Hoover and Mr. Klein in 1925. It was none other than the alleged expert on economy, the Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS, chairman of the Appropriations Committee that failed to function in this Congress, and had the Economy Committee created to perform many of its duties. Oh, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] sniped in, in trying to picture the wrecking of the economy bill as a responsibility of the Republicans. While the Democratic leader was making his political speech, he read that old Jeffersonian Democrat, General MARTIN, out of the party.

Then they tried to put the blame on the Republicans for wrecking the Army and Navy consolidation. That consolidation amendment was offered by General MARTIN, a Jeffersonian Democrat.

Then the amendment to emasculate the veterans' title was offered by another distinguished Jeffersonian Democrat, a distinguished former soldier, Major BULWINKLE, the gentleman from North Carolina.

Do not forget that when the provision of the bill was being considered which would permit the departments themselves to interchange 15 per cent of the appropriations, the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] was down in the well of the House crying crocodile tears in opposition to the provision. Oh, he said, it was vicious, and would be giving away the God-given rights of Congress to a bureaucrat.

Mr. BYRNS made this eloquent speech to preserve the rights of Congress from the encroachment by the President. Where was he on the Army and Navy consolidation? He then spoke eloquently in favor of the provision of the bill providing for the consolidation of the Army and Navy. This legislation was chloroformed in the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, with only two gentlemen appearing before the committee in favor of it, Mr. BYRNS and Mr. WILLIAMSON. Do not blame that action to kill the Army and Navy consolidation on the Republicans, because the Democrats have a majority of members on the Expenditures Committee.

The chairman of the Appropriations Committee, who wanted to preserve the rights of Congress from encroachment by the Executive when he was weeping at the 15 per cent interchange proposition, stood on the floor that same day, and stood on the floor to-day, ready to give, not to the President but to a Cabinet officer, a secretary of national defense, a bureaucrat, the absolute right and authority to consolidate, to expand, to eliminate and create bureaus, and do what he wants to do with almost a billion dollars a year appropriation for the War and Navy Departments, without any saving veto power on the part of Congress. Talk about pure political demagoguery and fakery—why, one of the biggest fakers in a midway could not come anywhere near to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] when he charged Walter Newton, a former Member of Congress, with wrecking the bill and inducing men to support the amendment offered by that stanch Jeffersonian Democrat, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. To inquire how the gentleman voted on the major program recommended by the Executive, the staggered-furlough plan for economy. Did the gentleman support his President in that respect?

Mr. SCHAFER. I was not with the President on that. I am not one of these fellows who yap and yell economy and let somebody else do my thinking for me any more than some of the Democrats on the gentleman's side—and if you talk about responsibility, you have a Democratic majority in the House.

In closing, I want to make a constructive suggestion to the President and to Mr. BYRNS and his Economy Committee, if it is going to try to function, in respect to consolidations. They tell us that we should consolidate, first, bureaus and activities that have the same primary purpose. Notwithstanding that, we have about 18 law-enforcement investigating agencies, with arms reaching out like an octopus throughout the country, with high-salaried pay-rollers, covering the same territory. You can save many millions of dollars by consolidating the prohibition enforcement under the Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice. When you have an opportunity to have some real saving and assist to balance the Budget, you ignore it. If you want to get $500,000,000 into this badly battered Treasury each year, I ask you Democratic economy leaders to sign the petition to discharge the committee from further consideration of the two and three-quarters per cent beer bill, if you are really for economy, the taxpayers, and the Treasury. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, Mr. MICHENER has just made the observation that Mr. BYRNS has been playing politics and has consumed about $300,000 worth of time. I believe Mr. MICHENER cost about $50,000, and my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] must have run up to almost as much as he is worth. [Laughter.] I can not estimate what the total amount would be.

There has been a good deal of complaint here this afternoon about somebody playing politics. Of course, that does shock my friend MICHENER and some other gentlemen on both the Democratic and Republican sides. By the time they have been in Congress a little while longer—my friend MICHENER has been here only about 15 or 20 years—they will learn that more or less politics seems to be played along about this time just before a presidential election. Of course, we have to take care of our duties here, but there is no sense in trying to be innocent about it. We know it and the country knows it. The President yesterday may have had the best sort of unselfish, patriotic motives with regard to his campaign—I mean with regard to the statesmanship of this situation—but I venture it would be a pretty safe wager—I do not think anybody would lose any money on it—that before he sent his message up here he called in his political advisers and they told him they thought there was some pretty good politics in shooting it. There is no use pretending about it. Everybody knows it, everyone in the House and everyone in the country. JOE BYRNS has made a political speech. Mr. MICHENER almost made one, and I would make one if I knew how. The only complaint I have to make of the President's message is that he is expecting a little too much of a Democratic House. [Laughter.] The President said in his message:

> I should not be discharging my constitutional responsibility to give to the Congress information on the state of the Union and to recommend for its consideration such measures as may be necessary and expedient if I did not report to the Congress the situation which has arisen in the country in large degree as the result of incidents of legislation during the past six weeks.

Well, where has he been? Has he just come to town?

Mr. BLANTON. He has been fishing on the Rapidan.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Eleven years ago a very influential political group in the United States took the control of the Republican Party away from the rank and file and put in office Mr. Harding as President, Mr. Coolidge as Vice President, and Mr. Hoover in the Cabinet. They went in at the same time and were put in by the same influence. Then began the reign of the great Harding-Coolidge-Hoover triumvirate, and from that day to this there has not been slightest change in the dominating influences that have controlled those administrations nor the slightest change in the basic policy of those administrations. They started 11 years ago, under full steam, for the rocks. They put the ship on the rocks. Is that not so? [Applause.] Now they complain that the Democratic majority of five in the House can not take that ship off the rocks, remodel it, and start it right in a few months. The President complains that "there is nothing more necessary than balancing the Budget." When did he discover that? During the last Congress the President's party was in control at the White House, in the Senate, and had in this House 267 Members to only 163 Democrats, and we are inheriting from that Congress a deficit of $2,500,000,000 and a country less able to pay taxes. The Democratic majority of only five in this House confronts a very difficult situation. Between this Democratic House and the country there stands a Republican President and a Republican Senate.

I am discussing politics. I am making a political speech now, or attempting to. At least, I am telling the truth about it, and that is something. [Laughter and applause.]

Mrs. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mrs. NORTON. The gentleman is not disguising his political speech.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Not a bit. In fact, I am afraid I am not making a good one. I had to listen to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and all these other Members and I cooled off a little.

As a matter of fact, the Democratic House does confront a difficult situation. There is a Republican President and a Republican Senate. You may say in political criticism of us that we do not have constructive ability, but this you must admit, with the Republicans in control of the Senate and the Presidency, the Cabinet, and the whole executive machinery, and the Democrats in control of only the House by a narrow margin, it is utterly impossible for Democrats to make effective a Democratic program. With the country brought to the brink of a disaster of major proportions, what is the patriotic duty of the Democrats? You may not agree on the eve of election how well we have done it, but it is true that the Democratic House, everything considered, has been doing the best it could, and a pretty good job of it, to help tide over conditions until the people of the United States can have a chance to give to the Democratic Party their commission to govern in this country. [Applause.]

The President in his message said:

> The most effective factor to economic recovery to-day is restoration of confidence.

And I believe that is true. I do not believe the country ever will be confident, continuing under the control of those influences which have had control in this country for the last 11 years and gotten us in this awful mess. [Applause.]

My friend the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] says all this mess of the past 11 years is water under the wheel. We ought not to talk about it. That reminds me of a story of a colored boy in my county charged with murder. When the case was called he replied to the judge's inquiries that he was not ready for trial, had no lawyer, had no witnesses summoned, and so forth. The judge said, "Sam, what are you going to do about it?" Sam replied, "Jedge, if it is all the same to you all I thought I would jest let the whole matter drop."

If a doctor came to prescribe for you and he had been killing his patients for 11 years, would you not want to know about it? [Applause.]

These people have had unchallenged control of this country for 11 years. When they took charge the people were employed, happy, and prosperous. They have put it on the rocks. As somebody said, "The great engineer has shown his ability by draining, damming, and ditching the whole country in three years." Suppose he has—that does not give him license to send a message down here lecturing a Democratic House because we have not repaired in a few months the ravages of 11 years of Republican rule.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. Does the gentleman think he would be more interested in knowing how many people he killed than in knowing that he could save future generations?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I would want to know, before I took the medicine of a doctor who prescribed for me, how he had been getting along with the folks he had been doctoring before. [Applause.] My friend would not say that is water under the wheel if his folks were being doctored by him.

The President criticizes the action of the House for favoring the expenditures of $132,000,000 for road building.

Now, the President ought to be fair about that, too. I wonder if the President forgot his message to the House just a short time ago? During the last Congress the President sent down a special message asking a hundred and fifty million dollars to be appropriated "to increase employment." The President was suggesting all sorts of appropriations from the Federal Treasury "to increase employment." That seemed to be the medicine which he was then prescribing. There was no talk about balancing the Budget then.

Mr. BLANTON. That was water under the wheel.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes; I know. A lot of people would like to forget water under the wheel.

The President, in December, 1930, said:

> I have the honor to transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress an estimate of appropriation for the fiscal year 1931, amounting to $150,000,000, for an emergency construction fund, to enable the Chief Executive to accelerate work on construction projects already authorized by law.

The President should be a little patient with the Democratic majority in the House. The situation is rather difficult for the Democratic majority in the House.

The appropriation in the year before the President went into office was $2,675,000,000. Is that right?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The truth of the matter is that the present deficit is about $5,000,000,000. We might as well all face it, regardless. It is a very bad situation.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. And the President expects the Democratic House to balance the Budget, when the deficit, created by a Republican President, Republican Senate, Republican House of 104 majority, the Republican gentleman from Washington tells me, is $5,000,000,000, or will be this year.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No. Now, we will try to get it right again. Reading the first report from the Economy Committee, the gentleman will find that the accrued deficit is $5,000,000,000. Some of that has gone into Treasury bonds.

Mr. BLANTON. But it aggregates $5,000,000,000.

Mr. MILLARD. Did the chairman get those figures the same place that Mr. BYRNS got his?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes. The gentleman from Tennessee has been talking to a Republican.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. For the fiscal year 1931 the deficit was $903,000,000, under a Republican administration. This year's deficit will be approximately $2,600,000,000. The estimated deficit for the coming fiscal year is a minimum of $1,243,000,000, and it will probably be three or four hundred million more. So in the three years of Republican administration it approximates $5,000,000,000.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Now, that is from an authoritative source. Mr. Chairman, my purpose primarily is not to discuss the President's message this afternoon.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman believes in giving credit where credit is due.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. McFADDEN. Is it not a fact that the Democratic Party has cooperated in putting through the Hoover construction program, first by making possible the approval of the moratorium; second, the passage of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; then the passage of the Glass-Steagall bill, and recently the passage of the Goldsborough stabilization bill and the farm loan bank bill?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. But I can not claim any credit for assisting with the moratorium or the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or much of the so-called program. I felt myself compelled to vote against most of the items. Mr. Chairman, the plain fact is that the President has received as much cooperation and more than anybody could reasonably expect under the circumstances from the Democratic Party, and he ought not to have brought in a political message on yesterday. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMMONS. Is it not true that the President in his message yesterday gave full credit to the Democratic majority of the House for cooperation in the early part of this Congress?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I say that anyone who reads the President's message of yesterday would construe it as a lecture of the House of Representatives for not having done its duty under these circumstances. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I repeat, the President specifically gave credit for the cooperation pointed out by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and in his message he referred to the situation regarding the tax bill and regarding the economy program.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The President, for instance, criticized the House of Representatives in the face of widespread hunger and idleness in this country for exercising its judgment and trying to put a pick in the hand of starving men in appropriating $132,000,000 to help build roads in this country; and the same President just a little while ago came before this Congress asking it to appropriate money to give employment to idle people. This is something he can not claim credit for, so he criticizes it. One would think from this message that the President and his party had just nosed into part control. If there is political responsibility for this awful mess it lies at the door of the President and his party. Where has he and his party been during these 11 years and what have they been doing that he should be coming down here and lecturing a Democratic House, into whose lap he and his Republican Senate and House of last Congress have dumped a deficit of billions of dollars, for not balancing the Budget from the revenues of a country which their government has impoverished?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Was not this $132,000,000 just a loan to States that were unable to meet their own obligations? It was not to spend the money directly.

Mr. BLANTON. And the $2,000,000,000 was a loan to railroads and to business.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I would like to have the gentleman answer my question.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman is chairman of the Judiciary Committee. Does not the gentleman think that the country would be better off if we would handle these matters in the House as the gentleman from Texas handles matters before the Judiciary Committee, and when the President sends a message we do not happen to like, that we go on and do what we think is right whether it follows the President or not, instead of spending our time discussing and quarreling among ourselves as to who should be given credit?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Let me ask the gentleman from Michigan, and I trust much his judgment: When a political message comes on the floor of the House, would the gentleman let a statement that ought to be challenged go unchallenged? The gentleman would not do it. The gentleman did not let the statements of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] go unchallenged.

Mr. MICHENER. After the gentleman from Tennessee talked for an hour and said nothing I thought the attention of the country should be called to it. Although possibly I might be human, does not the gentleman, in answer to my question, think that would be the statesmanlike thing to do?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes. The statesmanlike thing would be for the President of the United States, when he realizes that he and his party have put this country on the rocks, to recognize the truth and not try to detract attention from that fact and to escape responsibility by criticizing a Democratic House which has not been able to balance a budget in a few months which he and his party unbalanced to the tune of some billions of dollars. Maybe he could not have done any better, but he had the responsibility—he had the political power—and we must remember that the Democratic majority is only five in the House, and the President controls the White House, and the Republicans control in the Senate.

As I said a moment ago, I really do not want to make a political speech. But the President had just as well know that we are not going to allow him to strut his wisdom as a superior brand and put on airs or lecture us when we are doing our best to cooperate in getting this country off the rocks, and when we know that he was a part of the Harding-Coolidge-Hoover dynasty during all the time when they were steering this country straight for the rocks.

One of our difficulties is that the President has been telling the people everything would be all right around the corner. They do not realize the situation. They do not realize the need and are not prepared to make the sacrifices which the President complains the Democratic House has not attempted to compel them to submit to.

He is complaining that a Democratic House has not laid upon the people burdens which he never asked his Republican majority in the last House of over a hundred to impose.

Where was the President and where was the Republican Congress about this time last year and what were they doing? Appropriating public money for any and every thing, piling up some billions of deficit, and telling the people everything would be all right just around the corner. Did he know any better? If he did, he was not candid, to say the least of it. If he did not know any better than to believe what he was proclaiming, then I submit he has not qualified to be lecturing a Democratic House about governmental policy or duty.

But I want to talk to you now, Democrats and Republicans, about a matter which I think is of tremendous importance. JOE BYRNS, EARL MICHENER, and these other people make political speeches, but that is not my purpose. I do not do such things. I am a constructive statesman. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the gentleman would only yield, I would like to indorse that statement.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, we confront—and I think everybody recognizes it—a very dangerous situation in the United States. The program which the President and the members of his party evidently thought was right has not worked. I am not saying that in any spirit of criticism. The President has given assurance from time to time that everything was going to be all right around the corner, and I am not going to charge the President with having deliberately made a false statement about anything.

That leaves us with this fact: That the judgment of the President as to what was going to happen was not a sound judgment. Maybe your judgment and maybe my judgment would not have been sound. That is not important. You created a corporation, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and gave it $500,000,000, with a possibility of $2,000,000,000, in order to relieve the railroads, relieve the banks, and so forth. Fundamentally what the railroads need is freight and not borrowed money. Credit is all right in its proper place, but we have entirely exaggerated the efficacy of credit. It is not a medicine which can cure every ill.

When we come to examine our economic difficulties the practical questions are, What is this, where did this begin, from what causes, and what is the remedy? As a practical proposition we know that the remedy which we have applied has not worked. We have got to do something we have not done before in order for there to be a chance for recovery in this country. Where did it begin? It began with the paralysis of the buying power of the farmers of the country. I know this will not prove very thrilling, but we have got to begin to use our thinking powers. One difficulty in America is that for 13 or 14 years we have been on a thinking strike. The difficulty we are in lies deeper than the mere economic difficulty.

I would like to have your close consideration, because, whether I am right or not, I think I am right. I have studied this question and I am going to give you the benefit of my judgment about it. I want you to think about it, because we Democrats and Republicans have got to do something we have not done before. We have tried everything we could think of and we are still going in the wrong direction. I am blaming nobody now, maybe later, but not now.

I noticed in the morning paper that the great Steel Trust had passed its dividend. Nobody, and no interest, is escaping. While the trouble began with the paralysis of the buying power of the farmers of this country, it has not stopped there. It could not stop there. I have been hammering away at that fact, trying to drive its realization home for a good many years. If it is not home now, it will be soon. To me it has been an incomprehensible thing that everybody did not see these conditions coming, especially during the past three years.

I know that gentlemen who come from tariff-protected sections may not appreciate what I am going to say, and I am not going to be unkind about it; but, gentlemen, even though you do come from neighborhoods where they have the benefit of the tariff, I ask you how can my farmers—wheat farmers and oat farmers—swap 15-cent oats, 40-cent wheat, and 6-cent cotton for what you manufacture? It just can not be done.

I think the President has diagnosed our disorder incorrectly, with all due respect to him. He thinks it is a panic. It is not a panic. You go out in the country and you will be surprised to see how calm the people are, everything considered, their suffering and distress. It is not mental in its major characteristics, it is actual. It is not a depression. People have tried time after time to start again. The President has given assurances that everything would be all right; and widows and orphans and people everywhere have dug a little deeper into their savings, hoping to recoup their former losses, but they have lost again and again.

If I am conscious of my motives in these statements, it is not to be partisan at all. I realize it is a matter of concern, equal concern to Democrats and Republicans and to the country man and town man, though they may not equally realize it. We can not keep on as we are going. This paralysis, which began down there in the country, is going on up. It has kept going on until it has reached great organizations like the Steel Trust. They are on the brink, too. Nobody would have thought that four or five years ago.

In so far as I can discover, the economic body is like your physical body. I know this much. This thing that is wrong with us is not a panic, it is not a depression, but it is a paralysis of the economic circulatory system. Can you agree with that? There is plenty of everything in this country. It is just not circulating. I am talking to thinking people, and I am tremendously appreciative of the intelligent attention you are giving to me this minute.

What the venous system takes out of your body the arterial system has to put back or there will be paralysis. The laws of God, as far as I can discover, are universally the same in their application. We are now interrelated, all of our industries. Every industry in this country is a part of every other industry. The people who work in the fields constitute the root of the tree. That is where the sap comes from more largely than from any other source. Let me give you a test or two of it. Can you conceive of the farmers in the wheat, corn, and cotton belts being prosperous while your people are idle in the cities? You just can not imagine it, can you?

It could not happen. On the other hand, can you conceive of those people unable to buy and your factories not closed? In order for them to buy they must sell at a price which will put back the blood which buying your commodities takes out or their buying power and the circulation of your goods and their crops will become paralyzed.

The trouble is that we have been going about this thing in a haphazard way, loaning money here and there to railroads and banks and so forth. That is not going to remedy things. That is not going to get circulation started. As certain as I live that is the trouble. When people lived under simple conditions and nearly everybody farmed and when the farm constituted the industrial organization and we were in little communities, we might have found our remedies sufficient, but when you have great interrelated industries that make up the economic body, such as we have now, then you have got to use your head.

It is a queer thing that in every human pursuit, in these complex and complicated days, men study the natural laws that govern in their field of activity before they lay their hands to the job. Nobody would dare to offer to be a doctor until he had studied the laws of God Almighty that govern the human body, and when he goes out to practice he has but one job and that is to try to apply his skill in accordance with those laws and in obedience to them.

The same thing is true of a builder or of a farmer and of anybody I know except the legislator or a president. When do we just get right down and figure whether or not a proposed piece of legislation is in accord with the laws of God Almighty, the natural laws that govern governments, just as doctors do before they prescribe? We do not do it, but I want to tell you right now we are going to do it before we get out of the condition we are in now. [Applause.] This condition in which we are has not just happened. Things do not just happen. They come from definite, antecedent, adequate causes. Such conditions as we are in come as a punishment for violation of the great natural laws that govern governments and govern human society. Governments are not accidents. Governments have been provided for in the big economy. There are natural laws that govern governments, but we do not think about them.

Let us see what is happening. I am going to ask for a little more time, because I want to develop this farther. The gentlemen are listening to me, and I appreciate it.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. For a question; yes.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WRIGHT. I yield the gentleman 10 more minutes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I want to ask the gentleman one question. The gentleman spoke about the tariff on wheat. And I would like to ask whether the gentleman would advise taking the tariff off wheat?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I am giving no advice on that matter now. I do not want to be led away from the more basic things just now. I will discuss that whole thing if the gentleman will just leave me alone, and I shall give the gentleman my idea about it if I have the time.

My idea may not appear to anybody to be worth a thing, but if I succeed in starting men to thinking constructively and analytically with regard to this problem, my effort will not be lost, even though it is costing $5,000 a minute. It is worth more than a lot of things I have to listen to. Gentlemen, we confront a serious situation. I have no great regard for human intelligence. If ever a people prayed to God Almighty for guidance, it ought to be now [applause] to help us to see what are the great natural laws that govern in the realm of government and, regardless of what we have thought or believed or preached, undertake to put our policies in accord with them.

I want to establish this point by point, and I wonder if the point is established that this paralysis that is extending up through the economic system did begin out in the fields. If you do not think so, just let us check up on that a little bit. You will find that just before their buying power ceased to exist there was lots of money everywhere, and everything was all right. When this thirty and odd million people were no longer able to buy, then the little retail merchant could not buy and could not pay his debts. The little bank began to be unable to borrow money or to extend credit, and such banks began to go broke, and so on and on it has come up like creeping paralysis that I used to hear the doctors talk about when I was a boy, until now it has reached the head and has reached the great steel organization of this country and similar organizations. It was inevitable that it should do this. The strange thing is that their captains of industry did not realize it.

If in your circulatory system your venous system takes out more blood than the arterial system puts back, paralysis is inevitable. This is a law of nature, and it is the law of nature that governs in the great economic structure. It is a law of government, and neither Mr. Hoover nor the Democratic majority in this House can ignore it and escape.

Now, how did this thing come about—this disturbance of our economic circulatory system?

First these people were put under a big economic disadvantage when steam and electricity worked its industrial and economic revolution. I am going to hasten along now. The peoples operating in the cities with cheap and rapid transportation organized great businesses including the selling end of their businesses. This is an important point and do not forget it. They were able to write into this selling cost the cost of production plus a profit. The farmer had to sell to the highest bidder. In other words, when the great agricultural classes exchanged with other peoples, other peoples fixed the price for both commodities and the farmers traded on that basis.

If anybody wants to appreciate how great a disadvantage that is, just swap horses a few times, as we say in the West, and after you have traded a few times you will be toting your saddle home and will understand the proposition.

Now I hope I can get by this without being partisan. Along about that time we established in the United States what was known as the protective-tariff system; I am going to be as gentle with that as I can. It is a thing you have to figure on. We are at the end of the road. While we have been bleeding the farmers to support the tariff system, they have been bleeding the soil. Comparatively speaking, both are bled white. We are at the end of going out to the forks of the creek and making speeches to the farmers every two years with the only interest of getting their votes. This is our business. It is the business of you gentlemen from the cities if you are to keep your people from starving and your factories going. We are exactly like a lot of people living behind a levee. A crevasse is broken in front of these farmers, and the water is sweeping around behind and putting out the fires in your factories. That is where it broke. Everything was all right everywhere else. I do not underestimate the effect of world conditions. I am speaking of conditions in so far as we are concerned. We proclaimed the general policy in this country of protecting the American producers from the cheap labor of the rest of the world.

Do we agree on that? That was the general policy which we declared, but when we came to apply that policy we said to the producers of grain, the producers of cotton and tobacco, the exportable surpluses, and they cultivate eighty-odd per cent of our acreage, "This does not apply to you." Think of that for a minute. I know it is pretty hard for people who have lived under the influences of a given economic condition to really look at it, to stop and think about it, to test its justice or its soundness, just as it was hard for my parents to think of slavery as they ought to have thought of it. I can not understand how anybody could favor slavery, but my people opened their conscious eyes first on slavery and never stopped to think about it. You have done the same thing with regard to the tariff. You do not stop to think that it is a bounty, although it is the most definite sort of favoritism. This Government says, "We are going to protect our producers against the cheap labor of the rest of the world"; that is the excuse for the policy just like a father with two boys who says that he is not going to let his family work in competition with the cheap labor of his community.

But he says to Tom, "This does not apply to you, you have to go out and sell in competition with your neighbor, but when you sell you bring your money back here and buy from this other boy, John, because I want John to have a higher price than his neighbors get, and the only way that I can bring that about is to have you bring back your money which you have gotten selling in competition with the cheapest labor in the world and pay John more for his stuff than he could get selling it anywhere else." That is the Gold Almighty's truth. No one can controvert that fact. The wheat farmer, the cotton farmer sell in competition with the cheapest labor on earth. I do not want to be offensive, but you gentlemen say that the American market is the best market on earth for your manufactured stuff. Very well. But for the American producer of these products the American market is the cheapest market in which he can sell. And why do I say that?

Do you gentlemen who come from the grain-producing districts suppose anybody would buy in the American market 200,000,000 bushels of wheat in round numbers, our normal export, and send it across the ocean and sell it in a market cheaper than the American market? You do not do it. The foreign market must be at least as much higher than the American market as the cost of transportation and other charges. The situation was bad enough before the war. I am not talking about something far away from your business of the city, whatever it is. This is the root of your plant, and you have just as much interest in what is happening down there with these farmers as a tree would have in what is happening at its root. I know that you can not tear down this tariff wall quickly. I recognize it as a fact. I am not making any free-trade speech this afternoon, but what are we going to do about it? Before the war we were the great debtor nation. We got rid of much of our agricultural surplus by paying the interest that we owed other people. After the war they owed us, and it takes now all of the gold they can get to pay the interest that they owe us.

If these farmers are to get rid of this surplus, they have to swap. To meet that situation the administration policy, expressed in the so-called farm relief bill and the tariff bill increasing rates was put into effect, the effect of which was to increase the blood taking from a part of our economic body already bled white, to further cut them off from market and take a still larger share of the prices they got to pay the bounty provided by the tariff system for the beneficiaries of that system.

However, I shall not discuss that farther, because I do not want to get anybody in an antagonistic mood. I want to help start up the circulation in our national thinking. If we had been thinking, we would not have been doing the foolish things of the recent years.

We have been working at the wrong place. We have made an improper diagnosis. I am as certain as I am of anything on the face of this earth that you have to revive the debt-paying power of these people of the fields before you can put your idle people in the cities to work. That is the root of the difficulty, but we are working at the top. That is why I am talking.

Let me direct your attention to another condition, or rather situation, which adds to the necessity of doing what I am going to suggest. These farmers are at the end of the passing line.

If a manufacturer has a commodity the price of which is increased, he writes that increase into the selling cost and passes it on. It is passed on and on. Everybody who can hand you a bill for what he sells, commodities or services, passes it on. But when it gets to the farmer who sells a bushel of wheat to the highest bidder in competition with the cheapest labor on earth, he can not pass it on, he absorbs it, and is exactly in the situation of a man who is at the end of the line of anything being passed from one to another. He can not pass it. He is at the end of the line.

How can my people buy your commodities with 15-cent oats and 30-cent corn and 40-cent wheat? It can not be done. We may not like it, but so long as we are taking this subsistence, this blood from the farmers by the might of government to support tariff-protected industry there is but one thing to do and that is to put back arbitrarily the blood that you are taking away arbitrarily.

You can not trust nature to do it, because nature is not taking it away. That is where the President has made and is making a serious mistake.

If a doctor came and found a patient being bled, already prostrate, he would not depend upon nature to restore him. Certainly not if blood is continuing to be taken. It is a fact that the farmers in the West, with 40-cent wheat, are compelled to give up a part of that price to pay a bounty which the Federal Government insures to the tariff-protected industries of this country. That is blood. They are bled white already.

If somebody suggests stop the bleeding, that would not be agreed to. You would not give up your tariff bounty. You would not stop taking the blood. This farmer has not got any more. The big job is to restore him. How can it be done? Exactly as a sensible physician would proceed. Reduce the blood taking, lower the tariff toll, and give him a blood transfusion at least equal in amount to the blood being taken. Something like the debenture will have to be adopted to put the blood back. There must be something like that. We must have circulation.

You can appropriate I do not care how many millions for this or that, and it will be like rain falling on a tin roof. Give back to these farmers what is being taken by the might of government and it will be like a rain on the fields of a land. It will make things green and start every little brook flowing. They will start the creeks and they the great rivers. My criticism is that the President's plan is to pour out the life-giving fluid near the mouth of the rivers, apparently expecting it to flow upstream and finally reach up on the hillsides.

People talk about trying to hold up the wage scale. I want them held up, and commodity values up, so we can pay our debts. But how can a carpenter getting $8 a day, for instance, do business with a farmer? How can 40-cent wheat pay for $8 work? Four bushels will feed a person a year. A farmer can not give for one day's work enough wheat to feed two grown people for a year. As a result the farmer keeps his wheat and the carpenter keeps his labor. If you do not get the price of that wheat and the price of that labor closer together there can be no circulation.

How can you expect to sell your automobiles? A farmer can not swap 14 and 15 cent oats for automobiles. The pipe, if I may use that figure, has pulled in two. The man is starving for the wheat, and the other man's barn and house are falling down for the lack of a carpenter. As certain as we live this is the seat of the trouble, the origin of our paralysis.

This will not be cured by nature because an arbitrary thing is being done. Tariff is an arbitrary thing. By might of government my people are being bled to pay out of their 5-cent cotton in order to give a bigger price to the people who are protected by the tariff. By the might of government people who are selling their wheat for 40 cents a bushel are being compelled out of that 40 cents to pay a bounty for those who are protected by tariff industry.

What are we going to do about it? I realize that it is the President's idea as expressed in his tariff bill of last Congress, and this veto in advance of anything akin to a debenture is to bleed them some more and refuse to put the blood back into their veins which is being taken out under governmental supervision and by its might.

I realize that I have suggested a policy which has the President's veto in advance. But I thought that the next time he sends down here to help the House out by giving it a free lecture on its poor brand of statesmanship, you might see if you could not swap work with him a little bit. I do not know whether we will need you after the next election or not, but we would like to have you with us anyway.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER].

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, yesterday afternoon the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], in commenting upon the President's message of that date, said:

> The majority of the Members on this side of the aisle have stood for the economy bill, and if it had received the same support on the other side of the aisle, there would have been no need of this message.

I challenge the accuracy of that statement. I challenge the ethics of the President in assuming to lecture Congress, which, under the greatest difficulties it has encountered in a generation, is honestly endeavoring to solve the many complicated problems which now confront the American people, and for which the administrations of Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover are largely responsible.

I want to preface my remarks with a statement to which I have given utterance on numerous occasions in this Chamber, that this Government and our free institutions are not built around the President of the United States. Our institutions are not built upon or around the executive branch of our Government, but ours is essentially a congressional form of government, and the men who established our independence and who formulated our organic law saw to it that there was incorporated therein language which would unequivocally, in theory, at least, preserve to the American people the congressional form of government.

There was a sound reason for that foresight and action. Our Government has its genesis in the abuse of executive power. From the beginning of history, from the time man first began to dream of freedom, every struggle for human liberty has been fought around the standard of taxation and was precipitated by an abuse of the executive prerogative. Free government had its beginning in the abuse of the prerogatives of the crown or of executive authority. The men who laid the foundations of our institutions saw to it that this would not be an executive but a congressional form of government.

Three of every four words in the Constitution of the United States have reference to the Congress, its prerogatives, its duties, its powers, and the restrictions or limitations upon those powers. The President is given authority to advise, recommend, and veto legislation, but no student of constitutional history, no student of our organic act, can read that immortal document and long entertain the idea that it is the function of the President to determine the legislative and economic policies of this Nation. He has authority to recommend and to advise, but nowhere except in the limited use of the veto power is he given the power to override the will of the American people, reflected in the deliberate judgment and action of their representatives functioning as a House and Senate of the American Congress.

The President in his message of yesterday criticizing Congress, among other things, said:

> The action further to enlarge expenditures in non-service-connected benefits from the Veterans' Bureau at the very time when the House was refusing to remedy abuse in these same services.

Here is a criticism upon the action of Congress in passing the pension bill for widows of World War veterans. Whom is he criticising? Who voted for that bill, and who are now being pilloried, held up to public contempt and public condemnation by the President of the United States? I call attention to roll call 61, where 316 Members of this House are recorded as voting for that measure and only 16 against it. The able and alert minority leader [Mr. SNELL] was only able to muster 13 of the faithful Republicans in the House to vote against this bill which the President in his message of yesterday severely criticizes. Who were the men he criticized? There were 149 Republicans and 167 Democrats who voted for the bill that the President in his message of yesterday condemns. One hundred and forty-nine Republicans, among whom were BACHARACH, BACHMANN, the Republican whip, BARBOUR, BRITTEN, COOPER of Ohio, CROWTHER, the show pony of the Republican Party on the question of tariff.

There was also DARROW, DOWELL, FISH, FRENCH, GIBSON, GIFFORD, GUYER, HADLEY, HARDY, HAUGEN, HOCH, and MICHENER, the gentleman who has just emptied the phials of his partisan wrath on the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and lectured this House this afternoon for 30 or 40 minutes. Yes; Mr. MICHENER, the gentleman from Michigan, voted for the bill which the President violently condemns.

Nor is this all, for there is also LEHLBACH and former Leader TILSON, RAMSEYER, and a long list of Republicans who voted for the bill their President so severely criticizes. I do not condemn them. I congratulate them because they had the courage of their convictions and voted as their judgment and conscience dictated. They have been here longer than I, and I respect them. I hope the time will never come in this House when I will not have the courage to vote for or against a measure as my conscience and judgment dictate, and I deny the right, power, authority, and prerogative of the President of the United States to criticize and condemn me or criticize and condemn other Members of this House, Democrats or Republicans, whose judgment may perchance run counter to the imperious will of the gentleman who by a strange fatality has a 1-term lease on the White House, which term will automatically end March 4, 1933, to the great relief of a sorely disappointed and afflicted people.

The so-called economy bill embraced a large number of proposals, all of which were highly controversial. I realized that there were two sides to each legislative proposal embodied in this bill. I could see where sincere, well-meaning men might honestly differ as to the wisdom of this or that proposal. I have, therefore, refrained from criticizing any of my colleagues who saw fit to cast a vote different from mine. I do not challenge their sincerity, as I am sure they will not question mine.

I propose to show by the record that the Democratic Party is not responsible for the defeat of the economy program, the charge of the President, the minority leader, and the Republican newspapers to the contrary notwithstanding. I call your attention to roll call No. 62, on what is known as the Britten amendment. The Britten amendment struck $55,000,000 from the salary-reduction program. It reduced the savings on salaries from $67,000,000 to $12,000,000. It relieved 74 per cent of all Government employees from any and all salary reductions. Who voted for it? Who voted that $55,000,000 out of the Economy Committee program? Here is the vote as shown by the RECORD:

Roll call 62 shows that of the 239 votes in favor of the Britten amendment, Republicans furnished 138, or 57 per cent, and Democrats furnished 101, or 43 per cent. Of the 153 votes against the Britten amendment, 61, or 40 per cent, were Republicans, and 92, or 60 per cent, were Democrats. The record conclusively shows that the Republican Members of the House are largely responsible for adopting the Britten amendment which reduced the salary savings from $67,000,000 to $12,000,000. A large majority of the Democratic Members voted for a $67,000,000 salary cut, while a large majority of the Republican Members voted for only a $12,000,000 salary cut.

The Republican Members of the House put over the McCormack half-holiday amendment. Roll call No. 63 shows that of the 267 yea votes, 147, or 55 per cent, were Republicans, and 120, or 45 per cent, were Democrats. Of the 132 negative votes on the McCormack amendment, 57, or 43 per cent, were Republicans, and 75, or 57 per cent, were Democrats. So again our Republican colleagues were largely responsible for defeating the Economy Committee program in reference to Saturday half holiday, which would have effected a saving of $9,000,000.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Missouri five additional minutes.

Mr. LOZIER. On the Vinson amendment against transferring interdepartmental appropriations from one bureau to another, to the extent of 15 per cent, no real saving was involved whether the original committee plan or the Vinson amendment was adopted; but the committee plan would have given the departmental heads authority to manipulate appropriations, favor some bureaus at the expense of others, and discriminate against certain activities and unreasonably increase bureaucratic abuses. Nearly all the Democrats voted against giving the executive branches this additional power, and most of the Republicans voted to vest the departments with this authority. On the Vinson amendment, roll call 64 shows that 155 Republicans and 27 Democrats voted against the Vinson amendment, while 167 Democrats and 42 Republicans voted for it. Of the votes for the Vinson amendment, the Republicans furnished 20 per cent and the Democrats 80 per cent, while the votes against the Vinson amendment were 85 per cent Republican and 15 per cent Democratic.

On the Barbour amendment, roll call 65, 151 Republicans and 146 Democrats voted in favor of retaining our present transport service, while 47 Republicans and 51 Democrats voted in favor of abolishing the transport service. Of the votes to retain the transport service, 51 per cent were Republicans and 49 per cent Democrats, while the votes to discontinue the transport service were 48 per cent Republican and 52 per cent Democratic. I may add that the distinguished minority leader, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], voted to retain the Transport Service.

Now, we come to the consolidation of the War and Navy Departments, which would effect a saving of from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000. Who denies that? Who doubts that?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LOZIER. No; not now. I will if I get more time. I say that nobody doubts the economies that would be inevitable if we consolidate these two departments. If you consolidate any two departments and put them under one head, you will be enabled to dispense with the services of hundreds or possibly thousands of employees.

In the last Navy bill we appropriated for officers and enlisted personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps $148,000,000. We appropriated $82,000,000 for the civilian personnel. In other words, we are appropriating $82,000,000 for the civilian employees of the Navy, and only $148,000,000 for the payment of the officers and men in the Navy and Marine Corps. For every $2 we pay the men who serve in the Navy or marines, we pay $1 to a civil employee in the Navy Department. Who killed the provision of the Economy Committee program for consolidating the War and Navy Departments? The record shows that the Republican Members of this House must bear this responsibility.

Of the 210 voting against consolidation, 150 were Republicans and only 60 Democrats. Of the 187 Members voting for consolidation, 139 were Democrats and 48 Republicans. Seventy-one per cent of the votes against consolidation were furnished by the President's party and 29 per cent by the Democratic Party. Seventy-four per cent of the vote for consolidation of the Army and Navy Departments were Democrats and only 26 per cent were Republicans.

The distinguished minority leader [Mr. SNELL] voted against consolidation. It is a well-known fact that the President, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy used their influence to defeat the Economy Committee program for consolidating these two departments, and Walter Newton, one of the President's many secretaries, came to the House and lobbied against this consolidation which would save the taxpayers between fifty and one hundred million dollars annually. Undeniably, President Hoover and the Republican Members of the House are responsible for the defeat of the plan of the Economy Committee for the consolidation of the War and Navy Departments.

I am pleased that every Democratic Representative from Missouri voted to consolidate the War and Navy Departments. Examine the roll call and you will find the names of ROMJUE, LOZIER, MILLIGAN, SHANNON, DICKINSON, JOHNSON, NELSON, CANNON, COCHRAN, WILLIAMS, FULBRIGHT, and BARTON as having voted to consolidate these two departments, thereby effecting an annual saving of from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000. On this, the largest economy proposal in this bill, the Democratic Representatives from Missouri voted as a unit, and it is regrettable that they were outvoted by many Republicans and a few Democrats.

On the McDuffie motion to recommit, the question at issue was whether Government salaries up to $2,500 should be exempted from the salary slash or whether the exemption should apply to salaries of $2,000 or under. The McDuffie motion sought to limit the exemption to $2,000, which would have meant a saving of many million dollars to the American people. Of the 167 Members voting for the $2,000 exemption, 114, or 68 per cent, were Democrats, and 53, or 32 per cent, were Republicans; while of the 225 Members voting for the $2,500 exemption, 137, or 61 per cent, were Republicans, and 88, or 39 per cent, were Democrats. Here again the Democrats voted for greater salary reductions than the Republicans.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Missouri five additional minutes.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GOSS. I hope the gentleman will complete his statement and then give the percentages on the passage of the bill.

Mr. LOZIER. I have the yea and nay vote on every one of these propositions, including the final vote, and I will be glad to give them.

Roll call No. 68 was on the Ramseyer motion to recommit and for the adoption of the President's staggering plan. Of the 146 Members voting for this plan, 129, or 88 per cent, were Republicans, and 17, or only 12 per cent, were Democrats. Of those voting against the staggering plan, 72, or 29 per cent, were Republicans, and 178, or 71 per cent, were Democrats.

The vote on the final passage of the economy bill was—yeas, 158 Republicans and 158 Democrats; nays, 31 Republicans and 36 Democrats.

On the final passage of the bill 158 Democrats and 158 Republicans voted for it, but before we reached the final vote, the enemies of the bill, a large majority of whom were Republicans, had amended and emasculated the bill so as to reduce the reductions from $200,000,000 to $42,000,000. No man can read the RECORD and justify the statement of the gentleman from New York, the minority leader, to the effect that the Republicans had given more loyal support to the bill than Democrats. The conclusion is inescapable that the economy bill, as reported by the committee, would have passed the House if the Republican Members had supported the measure as loyally as the Democrats did. The responsibility for wrecking the economy program rests on the Members of the President's party. A word from President Hoover would have lined the Republicans in the House side by side with the Democrats, and the bill would have passed providing for $200,000,000 reduction. But largely as a result of Republican votes the bill as passed only effected a saving of about $42,000,000.

Mr. HOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. As the gentleman has referred to those roll calls, I happen to be one of those who voted for the McDuffie motion to recommit; in fact, I voted, as far as I know, on every vote to protect the economy bill, but the gentleman will recall that we gave to his side of the House 52 votes in support of the McDuffie motion to recommit, which went to the heart of salary reductions, but when it came to the Ramseyer motion, which would have meant a saving of $67,000,000, the gentleman's side was only able to muster 10 votes.

Mr. LOZIER. My friend the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH] was a steadfast and consistent friend of the Economy Committee bill. He voted right, as is his almost unfailing custom. The gentleman's faith was shown by his works, or votes. I regret that more Democrats and Republicans did not look at this bill from the standpoint of the gentleman from Kansas. But I could not go with him on the Ramseyer motion to recommit, because I believe the President's so-called staggering plan is half-baked and would prove disappointing to both the employees and the Government. I can not see how it could have effected any substantial saving in Government expenses.

Mr. HOCH. Did it not at least reduce the exemption from $2,500 to $2,000?

Mr. LOZIER. Yes; it did have that merit.

Now, this bill when introduced called for salary reductions and other economies amounting to over $200,000,000. In the House it was amended so as to provide for only about $42,000,000 reductions. Why was not the bill put over in its original form? You will say that the Federal employees and other organized groups fought it. That is true, but the forces and influences that emasculated and practically defeated this bill came from the great cities and from industrial, commercial, and big business centers.

I have a feeling of friendship and genuine good will for all vocational groups, no matter where they may live, but I can not shut my eyes to the fact that there is often what is seemingly an irreconcilable conflict between the viewpoint of the industrialist and big city man on the one hand and the agricultural classes and so-called common people and middle classes on the other hand. This economy bill has forcibly emphasized these different viewpoints. The economy bill was defeated largely by Representatives from commercial and industrial sections and great centers of wealth and population. Let us examine the roll calls. On the Britten amendment to exclude salaries of $2,500 or under from reduction the vote was as follows:

New York, 33 for, 8 against.
Pennsylvania, 27 for, 3 against.
Massachusetts, 14 for, 2 against.
New Jersey, 9 for, 2 against.
Ohio, 13 for, 7 against.
Illinois, 17 for, 2 against.

The six New England States cast 25 votes for and 6 against the Britten amendment. The four States of New York, New Jersey, Delaware, and Pennsylvania cast 70 votes for and 14 against the Britten amendment. The 10 Northeastern States—Pennsylvania, Delaware, New Jersey, New York, and the 6 New England States—cast 95 votes in favor of the Britten amendment and 20 against.

The Representatives from the big cities wrecked the Economy Committee program. Greater New York, Buffalo, Syracuse, Rochester, Albany, and other New York metropolitan centers; Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, and other large Pennsylvania cities; Boston and other large Massachusetts cities; Trenton, Newark, Camden, and other metropolitan areas in New Jersey; Chicago and other large Illinois cities; Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati, Toledo, and other large Ohio cities; and Los Angeles, San Francisco, and other California cities, and Representatives from other big cities romped all over the Economy Committee program. The large cities in 7 States furnished 104 votes to put over the Britten amendment which reduced salary cuts from $67,000,000 to $12,000,000. Moreover, the influence of the Representatives from these great cities and industrial centers tremendously influenced the vote of Representatives from agricultural sections. It is practically impossible to put over any legislative program in Congress when the Representatives of the industrial areas and large cities oppose it. I ask the newspapers and public generally to examine the roll calls; and when they do, they will realize the difficulties the friends of the economy bill had in trying to enact this legislation over the opposition of these powerful organized groups.

In stating my views as to the causes that practically defeated this economy legislation I am not reflecting on the sincerity and patriotism of the Representatives from the great cities and industrial centers.

I am merely calling attention to their viewpoint and to the fact that their political philosophy radically differs from the economic views of those of us who live in the great hinterland and great open spaces. If half of the Representatives from cities and industrial sections could have seen this economy bill from our viewpoint and voted with us, the bill in its original form would have been enacted.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. LOZIER. We have in the United States to-day 30,000,000 farmers, who depend either directly or indirectly on agriculture for a livelihood, millions of whom are insolvent and dangerously close to bankruptcy. They have lost the earnings and accumulations of a lifetime. Possibly as many as a hundred million American people have practically no purchasing power. You talk about opening the mills and factories. You talk about starting men to work. That is all right, as far as it goes. You could not operate these factories more than a few weeks or months. Why? Because the goods could not be sold and would accumulate in the warehouses and in the factories. Because the buying power of from 70,000,000 to 100,000,000 people has been practically destroyed. You ask me how long this depression will last. I do not know, but it will last until the buying power of these 70,000,000 or 100,000,000 people is restored, and it will not end until that time. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM].

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, the outstanding contribution of the United States to civil government was the principle of the complete separation of church and state. During recent years there has been a growing tendency on the part of some ecclesiastical organizations and leaders to forget that the true mission of the church is spiritual. Gradually they have arrogated to themselves the right to enter the political arena, in direct contravention to this American traditional principle, until to-day they constitute a real menace to the liberty of the American people.

Convinced after many years of observation in Washington that the Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals was the chief offender against this salutary American traditional principle and was seeking to dominate the political life of the American people, I took occasion in April of 1930 to expose its offensive interference with the State by laying specific charges of its violation of this principle before the Senate lobby investigating committee.

During the investigation that followed and as a mere incident to it, facts came to light that indicated the violation of the Federal corrupt practices act by Bishop James Cannon, jr., chairman of the Commission on Prohibition and Social Service of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. Another Senate committee, commonly referred to as the Nye committee, after a complete investigation, unanimously reported Bishop Cannon guilty of violation of this act. The evidence in the case was placed before the United States attorney, with the result that Bishop Cannon was indicted by a Federal grand jury for violation of this act. The bishop is now engaged in raising technical objections to the validity of this indictment.

Bishop Cannon, however, may now be dismissed, as nothing is left of him except a number of libel suits in which he claims damages aggregating about $8,000,000 to what he chooses to call his reputation, not one of which suits he will dare to bring to trial.

The political influence of Bishop Cannon has been destroyed, but there does remain in operation the chief offender, the Methodist Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals.

An investigation of the affairs of this board by the lobby investigating committee revealed that the board had violated in the most flagrant manner the principle of the complete separation of church and State by engaging in political lobbying activities, by interfering with the Federal judiciary in attempting to dictate appointments and to coerce judges, by taking an active part in political campaigns, and by expending sectarian funds for partisan political purposes.

The principal charges before the Senate lobby investigating committee were made against Clarence True Wilson, so-called general secretary of the board. Although the committee continued its sessions for several months, Mr. Wilson never dared to appear before the committee, where he would have been subject to cross-examination under oath. He sent to represent him and the board Deets Pickett, so-called research secretary of the board.

Mr. Pickett defended the activities of the board in the name of free speech, free press, and the right to petition; but it was developed before the committee that with systematic lobbying and communications to Congress, and with systematic attempts to dictate the appointment of Federal judges and district attorneys, and to coerce the judiciary, this board had grossly abused these rights.

To substantiate the charges of lobbying, evidence was submitted to the committee, from an official publication of the board, that in raising funds for the headquarters of the board directly opposite to the Capitol, erected at a cost of about $500,000, it was stated:

> Fortunately we have the location of all locations, just opposite the Senate wing of the Capitol—

And—

> Of all purchases that have ever been made for Methodism between the two oceans, this is by all odds the most fortunate and the most strategic.

The location of their headquarters "just opposite the Senate wing of the Capitol" is "fortunate" and "strategic" because it enables them to carry out their purpose of maintaining close surveillance upon Congress and intimate contacts with Members of Congress, as the board has continually done.

In a public letter written to the board on April 29, 1929, Senator COPELAND, of New York, a Methodist, denounced the board for "its manifest efforts to dictate and control legislation" and branded Deets Pickett as a lobbyist, charging that he had appealed to him as a "Methodist" to vote in favor of a certain legislative proposal.

There was submitted to the committee also evidence that in the headquarters of the board directly across from the Capitol there was kept a card index of all the Members of the Senate and House on which appeared all the information concerning each Member that could be assembled, including his church affiliation; that the agents of this church board communicated with Senators and Representatives in relation to legislation, and that Clarence True Wilson had appeared before committees of Congress; and that the Clipsheet, which expressed both legislative and political views, and denunciations of public officials with whom the board did not agree, of whom I have been one, was sent regularly to Members of the Senate and House.

To substantiate the charges of interference with the judiciary there was submitted to the investigating committee an article which appeared in the August 3, 1929, edition of Collier's Weekly, in which Mr. Wilson stated with reference to the appointment of judges and district attorneys:

> * * * I do not recall that in a single instance of the 50 that I have been interested in an appointment has been secured. * * *

It will be noted that Mr. Wilson unequivocally states that he was interested in 50 appointments connected with the United States judicial service.

There was submitted to the committee also copy of an address which Mr. Wilson delivered in Massachusetts on April 12, 1929, in which he denounced the Federal judiciary in the following terms:

> The worst anarchists we've got in this country are not the bootleggers, but the judges who won't impose the penalties that they should.

Thus it will be seen that Mr. Wilson not only attempted to appoint the judges but also tried to coerce them after their appointment to do the will of the Methodist board.

Let me review briefly the evidence—the conclusive evidence—that was developed before this committee in support of my charges that the board had violated the Federal corrupt practices act, as had Bishop Cannon.

The Federal corrupt practices act provides that any organization which "makes expenditures for the purpose of influencing or attempting to influence the election of candidates or presidential and vice presidential electors in two or more States" shall file a report of such expenditures under oath with the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Neither this board nor its officers, Clarence True Wilson or Deets Pickett, reported to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, as required by law, the expenditures which they made during the 1928 political campaign to influence the 1928 election.

They deny that any of their money was spent for political purposes.

Let me submit to this committee and put upon the table for examination, in order that the committee may see for itself that it is wholly political in character, a circular issued by the board during the 1928 campaign. It will be noted that it bears the names of Clarence True Wilson and Deets Pickett as officers of the board. This circular purports to be Governor Smith's legislative record with a political interpretation by the board.

Let me quote from the records of the Senate lobby investigating committee the testimony of Deets Pickett under cross-examination in relation to this circular:

> Senator BLAINE. Now, why did you have such enormous quantities of that literature circulated?
>
> Mr. PICKETT. Because we wanted everybody to get right and know what that record in regard to prohibition was. We wanted that there be no misunderstanding so far as we could make the matter clear.
>
> Senator BLAINE. And you wanted them to know that they should not vote for Governor Smith.
>
> Mr. PICKETT. We wanted them to know what that might mean to the Constitution of the United States.
>
> Senator BLAINE. But it was opposed to Governor Smith?
>
> Mr. PICKETT. It was opposed to his position on prohibition.
>
> Senator BLAINE. This literature was not issued to aid the candidacy of Governor Smith, certainly.
>
> Mr. PICKETT. I do not think it helped him any.
>
> Senator BLAINE. And it was circulated to aid the candidacy of some one else against Governor Smith?
>
> Mr. PICKETT. That was purely incidental. That was purely incidental.
> Senator BLAINE. That is rather hairsplitting. I won't go into that. The statement, of course, speaks for itself.

I wish to submit to the committee also, and I hope the committee will examine it, a typewritten copy of a report headed Sixteenth Annual Report of Deets Pickett, research secretary of the Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals, December 4, 1928. This report was handed to me by a member of the press gallery within 24 hours of its issuance and is the copy upon which I based my charges before the Senate committee. On page 8, as you will note, there appears the following:

> The board circulated enormous quantities of Al Smith's record, a detailed account of the governor's attitude toward the prohibition law and liquor restriction since his early days of political activity. This record was supported by photostatic reproductions of each page of the New York Legislature's Journal on which any part of the record appeared.

As will be seen, this statement is directly followed by the sentence—

> The Clipsheet was nonpartisan but unequivocal in its opposition to Mr. Smith on other than partisan grounds.

When Mr. Pickett appeared before the committee six weeks later on behalf of the board there was submitted to the committee copy of this same sixteenth annual report taken from the files of the board, which had this one remarkable change: At the end of the sentence—

> This record was supported by photostatic reproductions of each page of the New York Legislature's Journal on which any part of the record appeared—had been added the words "and was sold." However, when Mr. Pickett was closely questioned as to whom this material was sold and about the records of delivery, and so forth, he could give no information whatever. In my opinion, these words were added to the report which I had already placed before the committee in an attempt to refute my charge that the board had violated the Federal corrupt practices act in the 1928 presidential campaign by making it appear that the board had not paid for the distribution of this circular.

Even if some copies of this circular were sold as alleged, it was developed before the committee that the board itself had distributed a very large number of copies of it, and this distribution would bring the board within the law as having made expenditures in an attempt to influence a presidential election.

No report of any expenditures for the printing and circulation of this publication, however, was filed by the board with the Clerk of the House of Representatives; therefore, the board was guilty of flagrant violation of this act, a criminal statute.

Violation of the Federal corrupt practices act by the board first came to my attention in 1929. I immediately brought the matter to the attention of the Attorney General of the United States in a public letter dated June 29, 1929, demanding that the board be prosecuted for violation of this Federal statute. The Attorney General took no action and now action is barred by the statute of limitation. At the time, and later before the Senate committee, Deets Pickett defended the distribution of the Clipsheet on the ground that it had the status of a newspaper and therefore did not come within the terms of the Federal corrupt practices act. But when under cross-examination before the Senate committee he was compelled to admit that the Clipsheet was not issued regularly, that there was no obligation on the board to publish it at all, that it had no subscribers who paid anything more than a nominal cost, that most of the Clipsheets were distributed free of charge, that it carried no advertisements, that it was issued for publicity purposes, and that it did not have the mailing privilege of newspapers. The mendacity of Mr. Pickett's defense is characteristic of the man who made it, as will be demonstrated later.

In further proof that this board did participate in a partisan manner in the 1928 presidential campaign, let me quote a statement which Mr. Wilson made in his report at the annual meeting of the board at Washington on December 4, 1928. Mr. Wilson stated:

> It looked six months ago as though I was going to be out of it, as my physician and the committee of our board ordered me to take a complete rest for six months, and, if necessary, for a year, but when I had had six weeks' rest, the Al Smith propaganda had a more stimulating effect than any medicine could, and I was well and at it again.
> I addressed 31 Methodist conferences, have given 98 campaign speeches, in all the Western States, and in Kansas, Oklahoma, Kentucky, Tennessee, Indiana, North Dakota, and other States, 30 in all.

No report of the travel and subsistence expenses of Mr. Wilson incident to carrying on this campaign was made to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, as required by law.

In this same report of December 4, 1928, Mr. Wilson stated also:

> * * * We did use all the energy in the planning that we were capable of in bringing about the election of Herbert Hoover as President and Charles Curtis as Vice President.

But over and beyond the violations of the Federal corrupt practices act by this board to which I have drawn attention, there existed what would appear to have been a clear conspiracy between this official board of the Methodist Episcopal Church and Bishop Cannon, chairman of the Commission on Prohibition and Social Service of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, to violate this act.

On September 15, 1928, Bishop Cannon wrote a letter to Mr. W. C. Gregg, of Hackensack, N. J., which read in part as follows:

> Referring to the fact that all funds which are used under the auspices of the Anti-Smith Democrats must be reported by our treasurer as used for political purposes, I would say that if you prefer that your contribution should not appear in the report of the committee, it can be utilized in the literature campaign of the Board of Temperance and Social Service of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, which can concentrate to that extent to the amount of $500, especially in Tennessee.
> We are carrying on two kinds of work. Through our board of temperance and social service we are distributing literature which emphasizes very strongly the prohibition issue without calling the names of the candidates, but making, in my judgment, equally as effective an appeal for Mr. Hoover and against Smith as the literature which backs up directly the personal candidacy.

This letter shows that Bishop Cannon had a clear conception of the requirements of the Federal corrupt practices act and a plain intent to violate the act. No person with even a rudimentary sense of moral obligation to obey the law would have written such a letter.

In the annual report of Clarence True Wilson, dated December 4, 1928, to which I have already referred, it was shown that the Methodist board made a contribution of $5,000 for the same purpose, as indicated in this communication to Mr. Gregg. We read:

> * * * Anyway, the next morning I came down to get the mail and got the monthly check for the world service for October, which, instead of being $15,000, as it was the year before, proved to be $35,000. This enabled us to rush $5,000 for the payment of printing Bishop Cannon's messages all over the Southland * * *.

Notwithstanding that this $5,000 was used for political purposes, namely, to influence the election of a President, its receipt was not reported to the Clerk of the House of Representatives by the anti-Smith Democrats, the political committee of which Bishop Cannon was chairman, or by the Commission on Prohibition and Social Service of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, the ecclesiastical committee of which Bishop Cannon was chairman, nor was its expenditure reported to the Clerk of the House of Representatives by the Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals.

The money spent for the circulation of "enormous quantities" of Al Smith's record, and for the traveling and subsistence expenses of Clarence True Wilson during his political stumping tour, and the $5,000 contributed to Bishop Cannon for the printing of his literature to influence the choice of presidential candidates in the 1928 campaign were all paid from sectarian or church funds. The use of sectarian or church funds for partisan political purposes is without justification. It is an attempt of the organized church to control the Government of the United States, a most reprehensible thing in a republic, particularly this Republic.

To show what may result from the participation of the ecclesiastical organizations in political affairs and from the expenditure of sectarian funds for political partisan purposes, let me quote a statement made by Deets Pickett in the November, 1928, issue of the Voice, the official monthly publication of the board, and reported on page 4752 of volume 10 of the hearings before the Senate lobby committee. Mr. Pickett said:

The bald truth is that the inefficiency of the Republican political organization in this campaign was startling. Except for the counsel of Senator CURTIS, the Republican management was lacking in the advice of astute and experienced political leaders. The fight was won not by the Republican Party but by the churches, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the Anti-Saloon League, and other temperance organizations.

This presumptuous assertion implies that the present political control of the Government of the United States is under ecclesiastical domination and direction, and that the last presidential election was not carried by the people of the United States but by certain sectarian organizations. No political campaign in the United States ever reached such a degree of degrading bigotry and intolerance as the presidential campaign of 1928. I do not hesitate to say that this disgraceful occurrence was due almost wholly to the instigation of this church board and its allies.

Speaking with full deliberation and knowing thoroughly the evidence in the case I am presenting to this committee, I wish to state that, in my opinion, if criminal laws were impartially enforced in this country Bishop Cannon and Clarence True Wilson would be in a Federal penitentiary for violation of the Federal corrupt practices act, a criminal statute, and that Deets Pickett would be in a Federal penitentiary not alone for violation of this same act but also for perjury, of which crime he is unquestionably guilty, as I shall now proceed to demonstrate.

On April 9, 1930, as may be seen from page 3752 of the hearings before the Senate committee, I asked that the books of that organization be subpœnaed by the committee. On April 11 I was informed that the day before there had been delivered at Baltimore 11 packages of documents which had been shipped from the Methodist headquarters here on April 9.

This information was communicated to the late Senator Caraway, chairman, and to Senator WALSH of Montana when he was acting chairman of the lobby committee with requests that an investigator of the committee be sent immediately to Baltimore to ascertain the contents of these packages. This was not done. However, when Deets Pickett appeared before the committee about six weeks later, on May 27, on behalf of the board he was asked to furnish the committee with information concerning the shipment of all packages that had been sent from the Methodist headquarters by other means than by mail or parcel post from January 1 to date. The following day the following colloquy took place between Senator TYDINGS and Mr. Pickett:

Senator TYDINGS. I asked if you would ascertain whether or not there had been any shipments of literature or other material from your headquarters subsequent to January 1 other than by mail or parcel post.

Mr. PICKETT. Yes; I asked everybody who might have any such information over there, and they said no.

Senator TYDINGS. No one knew?

Mr. PICKETT. No one knew. I did not know what you were getting at, Senator, yesterday, but it was brought out a short while ago. There are none of our records in Baltimore or anywhere. We have no office anywhere except right here. Here is all the dynamite on the table.

Senator TYDINGS. That is so far as you know?

Mr. PICKETT. I can state positively I do know.

Senator TYDINGS. Doctor Wilson is secretary of the board, is he not?

Mr. PICKETT. Yes.

Senator TYDINGS. He might have taken occasion to dispose of records without your knowledge?

Mr. PICKETT. Yes.

Senator TYDINGS. You did not communicate with him since yesterday?

Mr. PICKETT. No. I know he has no letters with him except a few letters that relate to this——

Senator TYDINGS. I did not mean with him, but he might have handled records in some way or another without your knowing about it?

Mr. PICKETT. No; I know Doctor Wilson too well for that. He would not know anything about it. He would have to ask Mr. Joiner where his files are, probably.

Senator TYDINGS. Do you ever use trucks as a means of conveying literature or papers?

Mr. PICKETT. No; except to send to the post office.

Senator TYDINGS. I mean you would not use a truck to make a shipment to some other place, would you?

Mr. PICKETT. No.

Senator TYDINGS. And never have?

Mr. PICKETT. No.

Senator TYDINGS. Never have?

Mr. PICKETT. No.

Senator TYDINGS. You have not in the last three months?

Mr. PICKETT. No.

Senator TYDINGS. So that if I were to tell you that there had been a shipment of some boxes that contained books or papers in the last three months you would say that in your opinion I was mistaken?

Mr. PICKETT. I certainly would. Perhaps I can explain it.

Senator TYDINGS. Please do.

Mr. PICKETT. You give me further details.

Senator TYDINGS. No; you say you never used that means of transporting any of your property.

Mr. PICKETT. No; we own no truck.

Senator TYDINGS. I do not mean that. You could hire a truck.

Mr. PICKETT. Oh, yes; certainly.

Mr. Pickett may protest as much as he likes that no packages left the Methodist headquarters from January 1 to May 28, except by mail or parcel post, but here I have photostatic copies of a freight bill and a freight receipt, obtained only a few days ago, which I now place upon the table for the committee to examine, which shows that on April 9, 1930, 11 packages were removed from the headquarters of the Methodist Board here and delivered the next day at Baltimore.

Can there be any other inference drawn from the removal of these packages the day upon which I asked the committee to subpœna the books of that organization than that the board hastened to remove and secrete incriminating documents?

In the light of this indisputable evidence I charge that Deets Pickett was guilty of perjury in his testimony before the Senate committee, and I call upon the Attorney General of the United States to prosecute him for this offense, prosecution not yet being barred by the statute of limitation.

The charge that the board quite possibly had a plan to obtain absolute control of the Government of the United States is not fantastic, as may be seen from the following statement which appears on the last page of the Sixteenth Annual Report of Deets Pickett, dated December 4, 1928, which I have already offered to the House. It reads:

* * * The great need of the temperance reformation in America to-day is a forward movement to capture the administration of every State, county, and town in America for honest, efficient enforcement of all law.

The use of the words "enforcement of all law" by this board, which does not itself obey the laws, is a mere subterfuge which it uses as a cloak for its real purpose, which is ecclesiastical domination of the United States and the substitution of a theocracy—government by the church—for our democracy of representative government.

Whenever the board is attacked because of its political activities and its delinquencies it asserts that an attack is being made upon Protestantism.

As the first principle of Protestantism in the United States is the complete separation of church and state and as Protestantism in the United States is opposed to the expenditure of sectarian funds for partisan political purposes and believes that laws should be obeyed, the claim of this board is an insult to Protestantism. Moreover, it is a danger to the Methodist Church, which I believe is not fairly represented by this board. I know there are a large number of its constituency who do not approve of the political activities and the methods of the board. Most Methodists still believe that American Protestantism should heed the admonition to "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's; and to God the things that are God's." [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman is yielded two more minutes, will he yield to me for a question or two?

Mr. TINKHAM. Yes; I shall be pleased to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman spoke of the Methodist Building being over here on the corner of the Capitol Grounds and of the board influencing Members. Since the 1st of last December I have had the pleasure of occupying an apartment on the fifth floor of that building, where our friend, Doctor CROWTHER, the gentleman from New York, also has an apartment. I pay $120 a month cash for an apartment there, unfurnished, and I had to buy all of my own furniture. I have never seen Dr. Clarence True Wilson but once since December 1, 1931. How does the gentleman account for his alleged coercing Congressmen so much?

Mr. TINKHAM. I understand the doctor has been sick for a number of months.

Mr. BLANTON. Is that the reason the gentleman is jumping on him now? He was not sick when I saw him.

Mr. TINKHAM. Oh, I would not do it for that reason.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman from Massachusetts ever wondered why it is that whenever he speaks there are only seven or eight Republican Members here and seven or eight Democratic Members?

Mr. TINKHAM. Perhaps it is because the House knows the honorable Representative from Texas is going to have many questions to ask.

Mr. BLANTON. If they knew that and that you would answer them, a lot of them would be here.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to include as an extension of my remarks the three documents which I have offered to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts to extend his remarks as indicated?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I shall have no objection to the inclusion of the last document which the gentleman says is a live matter now and concerning which there has been no action with respect to the 11 packages referred to; but as to the long double-columned printed document that related to a back transaction concerning which now there is no valid charge whatever in the courts against Bishop Cannon or anybody else I object to that going in the RECORD. I shall not object to the document relating to the packages or the other typewritten report referred to.

Mr. TINKHAM. Let me state then, Mr. Chairman, that I shall only offer those two documents.

Mr. BLANTON. They were used to elect President Hoover and against the Democratic candidate. The gentleman's Attorney General is a Republican; he has refused to take any action, and he must have had good reason. The gentleman's indictment against Bishop Cannon has been held to be no good, and so there is no charge against him.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts as modified?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

SIXTEENTH ANNUAL REPORT OF DEETS PICKETT, RESEARCH SECRETARY OF THE BOARD OF TEMPERANCE, PROHIBITION, AND PUBLIC MORALS, DECEMBER 4, 1928

I feel that little time need be used in describing to you much of the work of the research department. You are thoroughly familiar with it. During 1928 we have trod the mill of routine and I trust have ground much good, hard wheat into mental and moral food. Hundreds of hours of work have gone into the collation of crime statistics, a prodigious task attended by peculiar difficulties in this land. Hundreds of letters of inquiry have been answered and material for articles, debates, and study have gone out in quantities. Matter has been prepared for the World Service News and the Church Bulletin, for Sunday school publications, for magazines and religious periodicals. We have circulated during the year a great deal of material on the Canadian system of dealing with the liquor traffic, believing that it had certain campaign implications and a peculiar interest to the people at this time.

The Clipsheet has gone out as heretofore to the newspapers of the country, and the Voice has reached our ministry. I want to say just here that a great deal of loose criticism is made of the newspapers and the news agencies. Our organization has no complaint. Even the great metropolitan dailies which are bitterly opposed to prohibition have, in the main, given us a fair deal in their news columns. As one correspondent said, "We lambast you in our editorials, but we take a pride in giving you a fair show on the news pages." The Associated Press, particularly, has treated us with great courtesy and has given our material such consideration as its news value merited. The Clipsheet increases in prestige year by year until to-day it undoubtedly has a large good-will value. It is being used in the school of journalism of at least one of the great universities as a text of propaganda methods.

Early in the spring Doctor Wilson expressed his opinion, although he gave no definite instructions, that I should go to Europe to attend the Nineteenth International Congress Against Alcoholism. I was very loath to do so, because of an interest in the approaching campaign and because of the fact that Doctor Wilson would necessarily be absent from the office at the same time. But a short time before the last possible day of departure Doctor Doran approached Bishop McDowell, saying that he believed my presence at Antwerp would be of assistance to the Government, and so a quick trip was arranged.

While I was in Europe I was profoundly impressed by the striking contrast between social conditions as affected by drink there and here, a contrast much greater than it was seven years ago. In the words of a leading business man of England, the conditions in that country are "appalling, drunken, hellish"; and while bootlegging in the United States is a distressing problem, it is as nothing compared to the conditions in England resulting from the toleration of public houses, sometimes half a dozen in number within a city block. Nor is it comparable to the evil caused by the drinking places in Belgium and France, where on Saturdays the poorer women customarily pawn articles of clothing or furniture in order to get a few cents to replace the wages which have been looted from the pay envelope by the estaminets and sidewalk cafés. "It is a weekly round of misery and privation, indeed of virtual starvation," among hundreds of thousands of families, and the communities show the results in dirty gutters and despairing faces. But if this be true and it is as distressing to any right-thinking American as it is to the native of the country afflicted, it is just as true that there is in evidence a striking change in sentiment among the leaders of thought, politics, industry, and commerce in Great Britain and Germany, and to a lesser extent in other European countries. Whereas seven years ago the press and politics almost universally voiced nothing but ridicule and contempt for the "American noble experiment," to-day we find here and there a leader who does not hesitate to say that his country must, for its own salvation, follow the American lead, while many hundreds of others are significantly silent. I believe that the political and industrial leaders of Great Britain and Germany are convinced that prohibition is an essential part of the marvelous prosperity of the United States; that, in fact, it is no longer an experiment but a wonderful success from the economic viewpoint; and that the minds of the so-called common people of these countries must be prepared to accept still more drastic restrictions on drink, with prohibition as an eventual and logical goal. One consequential figure in British public life said, "We still believe that you are suffering from great social evils because of your way of handling the drink question; but the advantages of prohibition are not only great enough to outweigh the social disadvantages but are absolutely compelling. Our situation in the face of relatively sober American competition is fast approaching the impossible." The remarkable evidence visible on every hand in Europe of a growing American trade is reenforcing these convictions. It seems to me that the results of the recent election will afford European opinion a final verdict on prohibition. I found the European interest in the American political campaign intense. Nor was the prohibition issue underestimated. The first question asked by a casual acquaintance would inevitably be, "Are the American people going to keep prohibition or will they elect Al Smith?" There is, of course, since the election a disposition on the part of that section of the European press which is still fighting the battle of the drink trade to mislead sentiment. I have a letter from my brother, Dr. J. Waskom Pickett, editor of the Indian Witness, Lucknow, India, in which he says: "The proliquor papers have been trying to tell us in India for weeks that Al Smith would certainly be the next President. But the last two or three days they have been publishing telegrams stating that the betting in New York was 3 to 1 in favor of Hoover. This they are accounting for by the fact that the bootleggers are backing Hoover and that they are so strong and numerous that they will doubtless turn the scales in Hoover's favor." And the London Daily Chronicle of November 8 declares that the enormous vote for Mr. Smith has served an ominous warning on President-elect Hoover, and that "it is virtually certain that Hoover will concede as the next presidential contest approaches that the noble experiment has gone far enough to demonstrate the necessity for some modification of the Volstead Act."

Nevertheless, in my opinion, the overwhelming election of Mr. Hoover will be the final and convincing message from America to Europe that prohibition succeeds, that it is a permanent policy, that it is indeed that greatest of all influences in the world, a victorious idea, and despite the attitudes of the Paris editions of the New York Herald and Chicago Tribune, despite the slumming and reckless conduct of many visitors to Europe, the great body of Americans, resident and touring there, support the policy by word of mouth and, more than is realized, by conduct. At a dinner of the American Club in Antwerp, where nearly every native drinks as a matter of course, only one glass of intoxicating liquor appeared on the table, although there must have been nearly a hundred Americans present.

Doctor Doran, attended by his State Department adviser, Mr. Anslieger, held numerous conversations as to smuggling with the government officials of Great Britain, Holland, Belgium, and France. I was struck with Doctor Doran's facility in adapting himself, not only to the conditions of his contacts with the governments of these countries, but to the environment of the Nineteenth International Alcohol Congress. This body is composed of representatives of the leading governments and peoples of the world, including legislators, diplomats, executive officials, social workers, church authorities, and specialists in the study of the alcohol problem. The temperance movements are becoming stronger in practically every country of the world. The alcohol question is pressing more and more for a solution. Conferences with these leaders of thought and action were mentally stimulating and vitally informing. I was highly honored by appointment as one of the permanent committee governing the international congress and was also made a member of the executive committee of the International Temperance Bureau, which is carrying forward so actively and intelligently the European temperance propaganda from Lausanne, Switzerland.

Largely through the efforts of the distinguished director of the international bureau, Doctor Hercod, we have been able to initiate study of the alcohol problem in its international aspects by a committee of the League of Nations. I may say, confidentially, that this was accomplished, despite the most vigorous and consistent opposition on the part of the wine-growing countries and that the matter has been so arranged that the actual research and reports will be made by ourselves. I think the board will agree that this should insure an unbiased, exhaustive, and thoroughly sound series of studies.

Returning, we found the contest between the church and the Tiger in full flower. The board circulated enormous quantities of Al Smith's record, a detailed account of the governor's attitude toward the prohibition law and liquor restriction since his early days of political activity. This record was supported by photostatic reproductions of each page of the New York Legislature's Journal on which any part of the record appeared. The Clipsheet was nonpartisan, but unequivocal in its opposition to Mr. Smith on other than partisan grounds.

Perhaps the board would be interested in a brief summary of the results of the election. We all know of the enormous majority of Mr. Hoover, but not all of us have heard that on November 6 the prohibition majority was increased 11 in the House of Representatives and 8 in the United States Senate. This statement, however, is based upon inadequate information as to the position of 21 Members of the House. The probable dry strength of the House of Representatives is 329 and in the United States Senate 78.

Both House and Senate delegations of 22 States are entirely dry. The House delegations of 23 States are wholly dry, and both Senators representing 34 States are dry. Four States are represented by two wet Senators. The Representatives from only one State are all wet.

Eight wet Senators ran for reelection. Four of them were defeated, three being replaced by drys and one by a wet. Senators Bruce and Edwards of Maryland and New Jersey, who have been particularly fanatical in their opposition to the prohibition law and extreme in their abuse of prohibitionists, were defeated.

No dry Member of the Senate was defeated by a wet, although there were 23 dry Senators running for reelection, two of whom were defeated by drys in the primaries and one by a dry in the election. Of the 11 new faces in the Senate, 10 will be dry, and only 1 wet. There is a Kansas vacancy to be filled and a member of this board is highly available.

Will you permit me for a moment to quote with perhaps just a little excusable pride a few words from an editorial of some length in the Boston Evening Transcript of August 13, 1928. It says: "We have thought for some time that the propagandists of the country might learn something from that famous body with the redundant name, the Methodist Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals. For many years that organization has issued a Clipsheet which is much more than its name implies. It is carefully edited, and it belies its name by publishing a great deal more original than scissored matter. We are not devoted admirers of all the utterances or doctrines circulated by means of this magic piece of paper, but we are constrained to say in the interest of general education that it is the ablest, most effective instrument for advertising a cause that comes our way. Our prohibitionist friends do not wait for some newspaper or magazine to put forth their argument; they say it themselves, and with such force and ability that they find themselves always in control of a highly efficient medium. They want the country to think their way, and they make a business of telling it what to think.

"Here is a hint not only for the wets but for all political organizations. The silent effect of original arguments and facts steadily dropping in upon the recipient's desk week in and week out is incalculable. Reprints are well enough, but they get nowhere in large newspaper offices, which are able to do their own clipping. But if our Republican and Democratic friends would mass their own ideas and hurl them forth as such into every editorial room in the country, their contributions would command some attention. Our Methodist friends have proved that. They have specialized for years with the news and the latest original thought in their particular line. Why should not the political managers?"

The Voice, going to our ministers, was demanded in quantities for circulation. One issue had to be returned to the press for reprinting five separate times to fill the demand. A speech delivered at a church in Virginia by the research secretary not only received a wide circulation throughout the country but was picked up by opponents of Mr. Smith in Florida and used in truly astounding numbers. I am, however, convinced that other factors entered into the Hoover victory in that State.

The Boston Transcript's tribute to the Clipsheet, which I quoted, tempts me to bring to your attention the significant position of the board as a national social force in contrast to its beginnings and its small resources. Fifteen years ago it was in one room, with an income of much less than $50,000 annually. Its current receipts have never been in excess of $150,000 annually, and yet to-day in that brief space of time the platform influence of its general secretary has become outstanding as the major factor of its kind, its literary organs have acquired a prestige which is unchallenged, it owns a million dollars' worth of property, and its effective participation in national discussions is indicated by the unfriendly words of Mr. Edward S. Martin in Harper's for November: "One of the great issues of this campaign is anticlericalism, not directed mainly against the Church of Rome, but aimed to rescue our Government from the domination of the Methodist Board of Morals." These facts constitute, if I may say so, a tribute to the personality and to the wise leadership of the general secretary, who drives with a loose rein, carries no whip, but always gets to the destination exactly on time.

As in former years, the research secretary has spoken on numerous occasions and has concerned himself in regard to other moral interests. An amusing incident of the year was the suppression of a prize-fight club just across the river. Professional prize-fight managers of the lowest character had attempted to impose their discredited and brutal game upon the District of Columbia, despite the fact that the law defines it as a felony. One of these men is now in the penitentiary at Atlanta. But others, thinking perhaps that Virginia did not have as much regard for its laws as the District, passed over the river and attempted the same thing at the south end of Highway Bridge. The Baltimore Sun, in reporting the stopping of this fight by the Commonwealth's attorney and the sheriff, said in part: "'Herbert Hoover has been elected and this match can not proceed,' cried Sheriff Fields, of Arlington, Va., to-night, as he stopped a fight about to be put on at the Relee Club Hall, just outside of Alexandria. Mr. Gloth, Commonwealth's attorney, said that he had been forced to issue such orders by Deets Pickett, secretary of the Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Members of the club asserted that the result of the presidential election had had the effect of making county officials afraid of the power of the Methodist board."

During the year our files have been entirely reorganized and are a magazine of information. I have had loyal and efficient help from Mr. Grant, Mr. Rollins, and Mr. Lattin, and for a brief time from my daughter, who has had special instruction in file organization.

The great temperance need to-day in the Methodist Church is an educational program organized along the best lines of religious education and promoted with religious zeal. And the great need of the temperance reformation in America to-day is a forward movement to capture the administration of every State, county, and town in America for honest, efficient enforcement of all law. Criminals and nullifiers have no right to place and power anywhere in this land, and there are enough patriotic, God-fearing men and women to drive them into oblivion wherever we choose to join battle. May God inspire us to the task.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, when the Seventy-second Congress convened on December 7, 1931, business in this country was trembling in the balance. Financial conditions had grown from bad to worse. Our entire financial structure was threatened. Banks were failing all over the country. During the last quarter of 1931 there were 1,049 bank failures in this country. In the month of October, 1931, there were 522 bank failures, the greatest number of failures in any one month in the history of the country. There were 353 failures in December, 1931. For the entire year of 1931 there were 2,291 failures, with deposits of $1,759,000,000. Many of these failures were of entirely solvent banks, with plenty of good notes and other securities, except they were not liquid enough for money to be immediately realized upon them.

The railroads of the country were seriously affected and the thousands of railroad employees were facing unemployment, and a general railroad crash would have resulted in the collection of no taxes from them and would have affected every school district through which they run. Certain railroads were threatening to surrender their charters and to suspend operations.

Insurance companies carrying 70,000,000 insurance policies, having assets that could not be immediately realized upon, including real estate, were in dire distress.

Building and loan companies, in which millions of our citizens had investments, were facing financial disaster.

The farmers of the country, through losses of 10 years, were unable to meet their obligations and pay taxes, and were even unable to secure funds to make the crop for 1932. All other classes of business were in the same financial distress.

The number of unemployed had increased to about 8,000,000. Thousands had to be fed and supported from public funds or charity. The situation was extremely critical. The truth is no one knew what a day would bring forth.

As soon as the committees of Congress were organized, about December 15, 1931, hearings were immediately begun on emergency legislation, in an effort to save the country from financial chaos and ruin.

The Banking and Currency Committee held hearings during the 1931 holidays. The Secretary of the Treasury and many representatives of all classes appeared before the committee. As a result of these hearings and the recommendations of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury the Reconstruction Finance bill was reported to the House on January 9, 1932. It was patterned after the War Finance bill. It provided for seven members, to form the board of directors, including the Secretary of the Treasury, the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, and the Farm Loan commissioner, and four additional members nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

This bill authorized an appropriation of $500,000,000 to be subscribed by the Secretary of the Treasury and the board of directors was authorized to issue notes, bonds, debentures, or other obligations, in the sum of three times this capital. This authority has not yet been exercised.

Section 5 of the bill states its purpose "to aid in financing agriculture, commerce, and industry," and authorizes loans to be made "to any bank, savings bank, trust company, building and loan association, insurance company, mortgage loan company, credit union, Federal land bank, joint-stock land bank, Federal intermediate credit bank, agricultural credit corporation, and livestock credit corporation," and in addition section 2 of the bill specifically provides that $50,000,000 of the amount so subscribed, and the expansion of the same, through notes, debentures, bonds, or other obligations, which increases the amount to $200,000,000, shall be allocated to the Secretary of Agriculture—

For the purpose of making loans or advancements to farmers—

under such regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture shall prescribe. The Secretary is authorized to make loans on first-lien crop mortgages where no other security can be given. This provision was intended as a direct benefit to the thousands of farmers who have no other security than mortgages on their crops, to enable them to make crops for the year 1932.

This bill was favorably reported from the Banking and Currency Committee of the House, without a minority report, and was taken up and considered in the House on January 15, 1932, and passed by a vote of 335 to 55. A similar bill had already passed the Senate on January 11, 1932, by a vote of 63 to 8. When the House bill was passed, it went to the Senate. The Senate substituted its bill for the House bill, and the differences between the two Houses were adjusted in conference.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation was organized February 2, 1932, with Gen. Charles G. Dawes, who has had extensive financial experience, as its chairman.

On April 21, 1932, Mr. Dawes appeared before a House committee, where he discussed at length the purposes of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, the emergency it was intended to meet, through assisting the various classes to which loans were authorized to be made. He said:

The object of the President and Congress was not primarily the relief of these corporations themselves as such, but of millions of the people who have entrusted these particular classes of corporations with their funds and who suffer if the power of these corporations to function normally is unduly impaired.

In other words, its primary purpose was to assist the individual citizen.

He called the attention of the committee to the fact that there were deposited in banks, including savings banks and trust companies, $46,000,000,000, which, he stated—

Represent the bulk of the purchasing power now existing in our country and are the ready assets of millions of families. Nothing is more important to the masses of the American people than the preservation of the credit and the normal functioning of banks.

These deposits had decreased $9,000,000,000 in two years.

General Dawes further stated:

In the normal functioning of insurance companies our people are vitally interested, for there are about 70,000,000 insurance policies in force and likewise with building and loan associations with their many millions of families participating.

As to the interest of the public in railroad securities, he stated:

In the securities of railroad corporations, practically all classes of fiduciary institutions dealing directly with the savings of the people are interested, as well as great numbers of individual investors.

As to other classes of loans General Dawes stated:

As to mortgage loan companies, credit unions, Federal land banks, joint-stock land banks, Federal intermediate credit banks, agricultural credit corporations, and livestock credit corporations, the same public interest exists.

In answer to questions General Dawes repeatedly stated that no loan is made by the corporation to any class except upon "adequate security," and that he expected all loans to be repaid. Loans are made to railroad companies at 6 per cent interest and to banks at 5½ per cent interest.

In further discussing the operation of the corporation, General Dawes stated that under this law the matter of loans to be made to the farmers, as provided by the bill, was turned over to the Secretary of Agriculture, who was authorized to make these loans.

In discussing the effect of the loans made by the corporation, General Dawes said:

The evidence of the effectiveness of its work is found in the fact that in the 71 days which preceded February 2, 756 banks with $521,000,000 deposits, suspended in the United States, while in the 71 days from February 2, when the Reconstruction Finance Corporation started its operations, to April 12, there suspended in this country only 182 banks—less than one-fourth as many as in the preceding 71 days—having $79,744,000 deposits, an amount less than one-sixth as much as those in the preceding 71 days.

He further stated:

In addition, during the latter 71 days, with the assistance in many cases of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, 79 failed banks, with $36,520,000 deposits have reopened.

He also stated that the general withdrawal of bank deposits had stopped and hoarded money to the extent of $250,000,000 had been returned to the banks during the period since the commencement of operations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

General Dawes further stated:

General confidence in our banking system has been restored, which is and always has been an indispensable condition of a succeeding general business and industrial recovery.

In further discussing the organization of the corporation, he stated:

As a matter of fact, however, the bulk of the bank loans in number and amount have gone to the small banks.

And later stated:

Only 5.3 per cent of the money loaned was to banks located in cities of 1,000,000 population or over.

As to building and loan associations General Dawes said:

These institutions gather their funds chiefly from the small savings of people of moderate means and occupy an important place in our financial structure.

He explained that the corporation has 33 loan agencies distributed throughout the country for the purpose of receiving applications for loans and making recommendations to the board of directors.

As to loans to other classes, with peculiar benefit to farmers and livestock men, he testified:

In addition to the above, the corporation has authorized loans to joint-stock land banks, livestock credit corporations, agricultural credit corporations, and mortgage-loan companies in the aggregate number of 24 and in the aggregate amount of $14,400,435.

In summing up General Dawes said:

The corporation has authorized, in the brief period from February 2 to April 19, loans to 1,757 institutions, aggregating $370,437,802, of which $285,456,521 has been disbursed to the borrowers.

And explained that—

Repayments during this period aggregated $11,384,263.

During his statement General Dawes repeated over and over again that these loans were made on "adequate security," and expressed the opinion:

Therefore, my expectation is there will be no loss to the Government.

In answer to the suggestion of the chairman of the committee that there had been some political criticism of the bill, General Dawes stated:

Chairman RAINEY referred to some of the political talk about the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and giving away money to big corporations and discriminating between large and small corporations, and so forth. It would be easy enough for us to form a little committee on the board to report out political buncombe and smut, but we are not in that line of business. A lot of damned demagogues in the country are injuring general business by mixing politics with it.

You want us to do a business job, and we are going to do it, politics or no politics, and it does not make a damned bit of difference what anybody says about it. We will do our duty. We will make our mistakes, but we will do the best we can.

One of my opponents is unfavorably criticising the enactment of this legislation creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and is making a futile effort to make politics out of it. I did not know that General Dawes knew him so well or so intimately.

The truth is this opponent criticizes this emergency measure recommended by the Banking and Currency Committees both of the House and Senate, the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, and which was enacted in the House by a vote of 335 to 55 and in the Senate by a vote of 63 to 8. He assumes to criticize a measure enacted to stabilize business conditions in this country. He knows more than all of them combined. Why does he not state the kind of a bill he would enact?

In further discussing the operation of the corporation General Dawes said:

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is endeavoring to do business on a proper basis as it sees it. Democrats and Republicans both joined in enacting the law, creating it, and it was a joint accomplishment. It was born of high patriotism and national idealism. Political differences should not involve this nonpartisan Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

After stating the rate of interest charged on loans is 6 per cent to railroads and 5½ per cent to banks, following an inquiry by Congressman RAGON, of Arkansas, General Dawes further stated, in reply to questions by Mr. RAGON:

Mr. RAGON. In your judgment as a business man you think the Government of the United States will make money out of this in place of losing it?

General DAWES. I think so; yes, sir.

Mr. RAGON. Whenever you help a bank, can you figure any institution that you can help in a community that would be more beneficial than helping a bank?

General DAWES. No, sir. I think that is our most important work.

Mr. RAGON. You not only help the directors of the bank, the stockholders of the bank, but the depositors of the bank and the business of practically every man, whether he is a merchant or laboring man, in that community?

General DAWES. Certainly.

The benefits and the effectiveness of this legislation are shown by the following:

Mr. RAGON. I want to say to you that before you went into operation there was hardly a day in my State of Arkansas that there was not a bank failure, and since that day I do not think we have had a single failure. That is how effective it has been in Arkansas.

This is measurably true of my own State of Oklahoma. Unfortunately, conditions brought about many bank failures. We have had them in practically every community. I have heard of none in my district since the enactment of this law. The depositors and business men, the people in the community generally, know the financial gloom that follows a bank failure.

Discussing the general benefits of the bill, General Dawes said:

Anybody sitting on the board where I am sees things are getting better in this country, and we are in a damned sight better position to see it than people over there on the stock exchange fooling at present with a peanut stand. We on the board get a cross section of the whole country.

This is an encouraging statement.

Then, directing attention to the benefits this legislation has been to agriculture, Mr. RAGON made the following inquiry:

Mr. RAGON. Under this same act we provided $50,000,000 to be loaned to the farmers, and that it could be expanded by the bond issue provisions up to $200,000,000.

In answer to this inquiry General Dawes stated that this was correct, but that this amount had been turned over to the Secretary of Agriculture to be loaned to the farmers, as provided by the bill.

Mr. RAGON. I wonder if you know that money is going to the very poorest class of farmers we have in this country, men who are unable to get supplies from merchants, men who are unable to get any discount whatever from the bank—that the very poorest class of people in this country are the ones this is being made most available to?

General DAWES. Yes. I think the average loan—what is it now, $450?

Mr. RAGON. They limited it to $400 and the average loan, I judge, is far less than $100. I think that is true.

In further discussing the matter, Mr. RAGON stated:

Mr. RAGON. Here is a note that has just been sent up to me by a Congressman here, which states that in the State of North Carolina, information comes to his desk this morning that under this law there have been advanced loans to over 30,000 farmers in the State of North Carolina.

The Secretary of Agriculture reports loans made to farmers in Oklahoma aggregating $590,524.

I do not have the figures showing the amount of loans made to other classes, other than farmers, in the State of Oklahoma.

Of the $200,000,000 specially set aside for loans to farmers for the purchase of seed, stock, and to make needed improvements, $63,342,103.81 has already been distributed throughout the United States.

Additional loans made through the intermediate credit banks, agricultural credit corporations, and live stock credit corporations, will increase the amount loaned to farmers to more than $75,000,000.

In an effort to prejudice the people against the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and to make political capital out of it, the provisions of the bill are not explained showing that $50,000,000 has been turned over to the Secretary of Agriculture, with the expansion limit of three times that amount available to be loaned to farmers of the country without any security other than liens on their crops. This will reach the very poorest farmers in the country.

Nor is it stated that there are 70,000,000 life insurance policy holders, and the benefits that come to them are not explained.

An effort is made to prejudice the minds of the people against the loans made to the railroads under this bill, without advising that millions of people throughout the country own railroad securities and that hundreds of thousands of laboring people depend upon the railroads for employment. Nor is it explained to them the taxes they pay for the support of schools, and county, city, and State expenses.

This bill was enacted as an emergency measure. Conditions were critical. It was imperative to stabilize all classes of business.

General Dawes makes it clear throughout his entire statement that no money is being given away by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to any individual, bank, or corporation, and that not a single dollar is being loaned except upon "adequate security," and that he did not expect any loss to result to the Government; but that, as in the case of the War Finance Corporation, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation should lose no money but should make a profit for the Government.

General Dawes further asserted:

Confidence in the credit structure of our country and in the banks of the United States has now returned. In general, bank deposits have ceased to fall and bank failures have been reduced to the minimum.

Every man who aspires to public office should inform himself on the questions he discusses and be fair enough to state all of the facts.

When we review the conditions existing when Congress convened in December and then analyze the provisions of this bill, showing the purposes for which it was enacted, and finally, when we read these encouraging statements by General Dawes to the effect that confidence is being restored and that conditions are being stabilized, and when we further consider the fact that this legislation was enacted, not for the benefit of the larger corporations primarily, but for the benefit of the common man—the farmers, the investors in railroad securities and laborers, the holders of life-insurance policies, and the depositors in the savings banks—and when we know all of the facts, I am sure we will agree that its enactment as emergency legislation was justified.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein an address by former Speaker Champ Clark at the Washington Press Club to the newly elected Members of Congress, of whom I was one, emphasizing the value of experience which comes from long service in the House.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, just what is the purpose of putting that address in the RECORD again?

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to put it in the RECORD for the information of the Members of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, ex-Speaker Champ Clark is affectionately remembered by the people of the country for his lofty patriotism and his long, honorable service in the Congress of the United States.

On March 16, 1916, he delivered an address at the Washington Press Club to the newly elected Members of Congress, of whom I was one, emphasizing the value of experience which comes from length of service.

The address is as follows:

THE MAKING OF A REPRESENTATIVE

REMARKS OF CHAMP CLARK AT THE WASHINGTON PRESS CLUB RECEPTION, THURSDAY, MARCH 16, 1916

[Printed in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 17, 1916]

It is a high honor to be a Representative in Congress, if for only one term, and with the number of terms the honor increases in geometrical rather than in arithmetical proportion. A Member's usefulness to his country should increase in the same proportion. A man has to learn to be a Representative just as he must learn to be a blacksmith, a carpenter, a farmer, an engineer, a lawyer, or a doctor.

"Poeta nascitur non fit"—a poet is born, not made—says Horace; but Congressmen—that is, useful and influential Congressmen—are made largely by experience and practice.

The old Charlotte district in Virginia knew this and kept John Randolph of Roanoke in the House till he became a great national figure. Then the Old Dominion sent him to the Senate and General Jackson sent him to St. Petersburg. There are sporadic cases of similar action in other districts.

It is an unwise performance for any district to change Representatives at short intervals. A new Congressman must begin at the foot of the class and spell up. Of course, the more brains, tact, energy, courage, and industry he has the quicker he will get up. If he possesses these qualities, and if his constituents will keep him in the House, he is as certain to rise as the sparks are to fly upward. No human power can keep him down. It is only fair and rational to assume that every Representative's constituents desire to see him among the "topnotchers."

Let us take the present House and see how long the men who hold the high places have served. I can not name all, but will cite a few as samples.

Mr. Speaker Cannon is serving his fortieth year. He holds the record, or, in pugilistic parlance, "he holds the belt," for length of service in the House in our entire history. In several Congresses he was chairman of the great Committee on Appropriations and then was Speaker eight years, only one man, Henry Clay, having been Speaker longer.

I am serving my twenty-second year; Minority Leader Mann is serving his twentieth year; Mr. Kitchin, chairman of Ways and Means, his sixteenth; Mr. Fitzgerald, chairman of Appropriations, his eighteenth; Mr. Moon, chairman of the Post Office and Post Roads, his twentieth; Mr. Jones, chairman of Insular Affairs and "father of the House," his twenty-sixth; Mr. Flood, chairman of Foreign Affairs, his sixteenth; Mr. Hay, chairman of Military Affairs, his twentieth; Mr. GLASS, chairman of Banking and Currency, his sixteenth; Mr. Adamson, chairman of Interstate and Foreign Commerce, his twentieth; Mr. Stephens, chairman of Indian Affairs, his twentieth; Mr. Slayden, chairman of the Library, his twentieth; Mr. Henry, chairman of Rules, his twentieth; Mr. Lever, chairman of Agriculture, his sixteenth; Mr. Padgett, chairman of the Navy, his sixteenth; Mr. Lloyd, chairman of Accounts, his twentieth; and Mr. Sparkman, chairman of Rivers and Harbors, his twenty-second. There are other big chairmanships, but these will suffice to show that as a rule the big places go to old and experienced Members, for most of the men who rank close to the chairman are old-timers. The same thing holds good with reference to members of the minority. As an illustration, Messrs. Gillett and Cooper, who are serving their twenty-fourth year, are the ranking Republicans on Appropriations and Foreign Affairs, almost certain to be chairman thereof should the Republicans ever again have a majority in the House, as in that event, in all probability, Mr. Mann will be Speaker, unless he is nominated for President next June.

Go through the whole list and you will find, with few exceptions, that the men of long service have the high places.

New England and the cities of Philadelphia and Pittsburgh have understood the value of long service all along, and, having elected a fairly good man to Congress, they keep him in the harness.

The Member of longest consecutive service is called "the father of the House." Five Philadelphians in immediate succession bore that honorable title—Randall, Kelly, O'Neill, Harmer, and Bingham. Then it went to Mr. Dalzell, of Pittsburgh. When General Bingham announced the death of General Harmer, his immediate predecessor as "father of the House," he stated that the five Philadelphia "fathers of the House" had served a total of 147 years, and he served 8 or 10 years after making that interesting statement.

In the second and third Congresses in which I served, Maine, with only four Members, had the Speakership and the chairmanship of the great Committees on Ways and Means, Navy, and Public Buildings and Grounds—a most remarkable circumstance, giving the Pine Tree State an influence in the House and the country out of all proportion to her population and wealth. These four men, Reed, Dingley, Boutelle, and Millikin—each served in the House 20 years or more. Other States might profit by her example.

No man should be elected to the House simply to gratify his ambition. All Members should be elected for the good of the country.

The best rule, it seems to me, is for a district to select a man with at least fair capacity, industrious, honest, energetic, sober, and courageous, and keep him here so long as he discharges his duties faithfully and well. Such a man will gradually rise to high position and influence in the House. His wide acquaintance with Members helps him amazingly in doing things.

I can speak freely on this subject without violating the proprieties, for my constituents have kept me here 22 years, and for 20 years have given me nominations without opposition, for all of which favors I thank them from the bottom of my heart. Their generous action and unwavering friendship have enabled me to devote all my time to the public service. I have not been compelled to spend any portion of my time in "mending my fences." My constituents have attended to that. God bless them.

The speech of ex-Speaker Champ Clark is deserving of the thoughtful study of every voter of the country.

In the present Congress, Speaker JOHN N. GARNER is serving his twenty-ninth year; Mr. JOSEPH W. BYRNS, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, is serving his twenty-fourth year; Majority Leader HENRY T. RAINEY is serving his twenty-eighth year; JOHN W. COLLIER, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, is serving his twenty-fourth year. The same is true of the chairmen and ranking members of all the important major committees of the House. I am a member of the Committee on Appropriations and have been assigned to two subcommittees: (1) Interior Department bill, which makes appropriations for all bureaus under the supervision of the Interior Department, the Indian Service, including schools and health work; and (2) Independent Offices, which makes appropriations for all bureaus not under the supervision of a Cabinet officer, which includes the Veterans' Administration, which handles all claims for disability compensation, pensions, hospitals, and all appropriations for the ex-service men.

Everyone appreciates that a Member of Congress should (1) know conditions in his district; (2) keep in touch with and be in sympathy with the people of his district; and (3) be honest and have the capacity to represent them.

No one should be elected to serve in any capacity who is dishonest or incompetent. No one would think of employing an attorney unless he thought he was capable of representing him or calling in a physician unless he had confidence in him, and, for that matter, no one would contract for the services of anyone in a business capacity, as a carpenter, a machinist, or a laborer, or to work on the farm, without making some inquiry into the ability and experience of the person to serve them. The prudent person carefully investigates the record and qualifications and ability to serve of the person applying for employment in addition to the statements of the person interested in his own behalf. We should exercise the same care in the selection of our public servants that we use in the selection of those who serve us personally.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LANHAM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11897, the War Department appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk; announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 9349) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House, agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. JONES, Mr. HALE, Mr. MOSES, Mr. MCKELLAR, and Mr. BROUSSARD to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 283) entitled "An act to provide for conveyance of a certain strip of land on Fenwick Island, Sussex County, State of Delaware, for roadway purposes."

A TRIBUTE TO MOTHERHOOD

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the subject of Mother's Day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, as we approach the anniversary so sacred to the memory of mother, I am reminded that Indianapolis, the splendid city which I have the honor to represent in Congress, is indissolubly linked with Mother's Day. In the spacious English Opera House of our city in 1904, 28 years ago, a public ceremony was held that impressed upon untold thousands throughout the world the significance of mother love, for on that occasion the first known public plea for a nation-wide observance of Mother's Day was made. The orator on that eventful occasion, who has since become known throughout America as the "Father of Mother's Day," was Frank E. Hering, of South Bend, Ind., teacher, orator, and humanitarian.

On May 10, last year, a wonderful celebration took place in the same opera house in commemoration of Mother's Day and in honor of Mr. Hering, whose eloquent and impassioned plea 27 years before had been heard around the world. The ceremony was under auspices of the Fraternal Order of Eagles, a great humanitarian organization that places the name of "mother" high above all things else to be revered.

The orator of 1904, the "Father of Mother's Day," his hair now tinged with silver, was present and modestly received the honors heaped high upon him. A beautiful bronze tablet, erected on the spot where 27 years before he had uttered his thrilling plea for a nation-wide "Mother's Day," was unveiled with elaborate ceremonies. There was much speaking, and among the participants were 4 distinguished representatives of the American War Mothers—Mrs. W. E. Ochiltree, Mrs. S. C. Gibson, Mrs. E. May Hahn, and Mrs. W. W. Gates, and 17 men and 2 women who attended the 1904 services that marked the birth of "Mother's Day." J. Pierce Cummings, worthy president of Indianapolis Aerie of Eagles, presided, and Otto P. Deluse, of Indianapolis, past grand worthy president, and one of the most beloved members of the order, was master of ceremonies and introduced the speakers.

Boyd Gurley, the brilliant editor of the Indianapolis Times, in a speech profoundly sentimental and eloquent, voiced the spirit of Mother's Day and Dr. John Cavanaugh, former president of Notre Dame University, followed with an address on mother's love that reached the very heights of sublimity, closing with a beautiful tribute to the "Father of Mother's Day," to which Mr. Hering responded with such feeling that for once his tongue found it impossible to speak the language of his heart and his voice choked with emotion.

It was my privilege to be one of the speakers on that impressive occasion.

By unanimous consent of the House, my address, which was entitled "A Tribute to Motherhood," is herewith printed in full, as follows:

There is no language known to men that can describe a mother's love. Of all emotions that influence the human mind it is the sweetest and the best. The bitterness and sorrow that would be the common lot in this vale of tears if it were not for mother love melt into happiness and joyous inspiration in the radiance of its tender flame.

Mother love has no yesterday and no to-morrow, but reigns eternal. There is no limit to its bounds. There is no plummet that can sound its depths. It reaches all the way from earth to heaven. With ineffable tenderness it leads the tottering infant past the dangers and pitfalls of life and guides him through the struggling years of childhood and maturity so that when the miracle we call death ends his earthly journey he is fit to take his place among the stars by the side of his Creator.

ORIGIN CAN'T BE TRACED

No tongue can explain mother love or trace its origin. The least we can say of it is that it is one of the mysteries that spring from God. We know that it is something real because there is no sacrifice too great for it to make.

Think of the widow who bends her aching back over a tub day in and day out to earn a washwoman's pittance that she may keep her children together and feed them and send them to school like other children—oh, there are many such in this land of ours! Does anyone doubt the quality of her mother love? Does anyone know a mother of a deformed child who is not all the more attached to him on account of his deformity? He may be a hunchback, or infantile disease may have rendered him a hopeless and pitiable physical wreck, but to mother he is all there is in the world. Reason may have left him forever, and he may be doomed to wander in mental darkness all his life, but, oh! how she loves him!

FORGIVES EVERY ERROR

Mother heart forgives the error of a wayward child before it is committed. The last thought of a convict who faces the noose or electric chair is of his mother. In his anguish he cries for her; to her he piteously pleads every extenuating circumstance so that she will remember him at his best; his only relief in his desperation is when he is enfolded in her encircling arms. Any trinket he may possess, a ring or watch or lock of hair or other treasured keepsake he leaves to mother. In all such cases mother love is tempered with pity, and what a potent, merciful, wonderful combination it is. Imagine the depths and sanctity of a mother's thoughts when she rocks her baby in his trundle bed and sings her lullabies until the sandman leads him gently into the realm of slumber and then lifts her eyes from his innocent little face toward heaven and prays to the Father of us all:

"Father, lead him not into temptation, but deliver him from evil."

SYMBOL OF DEVOTION

From the time of Eve, who laid her very own on the altar of grief, down through the ages to Mary, who witnessed the unspeakable tragedy of the cross, and on and on, century after century, the word "mother" has always been the symbol of devotion, every age presenting in myriad repetitions and varying forms the solicitudes and sacrifices of mother love. Millions have been touched by the tribute paid by Abraham Lincoln, when that great, tender-hearted man who groped his dark way to a martyr's grave, paid to his mother the deathless tribute of saying that all that he was or hoped to be he owed to her.

We have met to-day for a very holy purpose. Although no time or century or cycle in the history of the world can claim a monopoly of veneration for mother, it is more than passing strange that not until 27 years ago did anyone in a position to reach the ears and hearts of men and women propose that a day be set aside in the calendar to be known as Mother's Day, when by appropriate observances, both private and public, the nations of the world could show their gratitude for mother love. We who are fortunate enough to be here to-day are thrilled with pride when we realize that this suggestion, so in keeping with the highest ideals of the human race, was first made in this very room by a great humanitarian who honors this occasion with his presence, Mr. Frank E. Hering.

We are here to dedicate a tablet to mark the spot where on February 7, 1904, this silver-tongued orator made a speech that has echoed since around the world. His eloquent plea for the recognition of motherhood which went out from this room has now reached every land in the circle of civilization and has found a responsive echo in hovels and in palaces. Out of it has come Mother's Day, the holiest day save Christ's Birthday on all of our list of special days, a new institution in the intricate web of custom and in uplifting power and sentiment, the apex of them all—a day which is the accompaniment and the precursor of other movements that will rob motherhood of much of its sorrow and leave it only its glory.

It is entirely fit and proper that we should erect this historic tablet. May it stand here forever as a shrine to remind oncoming generations of the place where Mother's Day was born. May it stand here forever as mute testimony of man's gratitude to mother. May its influence radiate into ever-widening circles so that those who behold it and those who hear from the lips of others the story of the origin of Mother's Day will feel themselves drawn close to mother, for that means close to God.

ECONOMIES IN THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and insert therein an address by my colleague the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, my distinguished colleague and personal friend the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE] always speaks interestingly on any subject. Last night he delivered in Washington, by invitation, over the National Broadcasting System, a nation-wide address relating to economies in the Federal Government, which I feel will be very instructive and informing to the general public, and which I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. JOHN M'DUFFIE, OF ALABAMA, MAY 5, 1932

It is not my purpose to discuss this evening the causes of the gravest economic crisis the Nation has ever confronted; nor do I propose to enter into a discussion of any lack of decision which might have been exercised when it was obvious after the dark days of October, 1929, that a terrific reduction in incomes would follow, and the question of balancing the Nation's Budget would become the outstanding national problem. Likewise, I shall refrain from discussing any failure of those charged with the responsibility to see and realize that then was the time for the Government to begin to cut its expenditures rather than let things rock along for two or three years with governmental costs constantly growing, and governmental income constantly diminishing.

I shall not even discuss the manner in which the membership of my own party have rallied to the President and in a nonpartisan way carried through his every worthy suggestion for the country's relief. That was only our plain duty.

The evils of a panic are upon us, and, regardless of the side of the aisle on which we sit, the time has come for the membership of the Congress, acting as a board of directors for the great business of the United States Government, to adjust the finances of the Nation with a view to balancing its books and thereby protecting its credit. Every citizen must know that when the credit of Uncle Sam is imperiled, every individual is affected and no business is secure.

Our country finds itself to-day in the position of a merchant who, under the stimulus of a number of profitable years, hired a lot of additional clerks and obligated himself for a bigger stock of goods only to find that his business boom was over. There is nothing for him to do but to remodel his establishment on a smaller basis and bring his books to a balance if he can.

The Economy Committee of the House of Representatives studied within its limited time the obligations of the Government and the steps necessary to bring the Nation's finances back to where there will be some relationship between income and expenditures. After working eight weeks we presented to the House a nonpartisan program for economy, which, if carried through, would have saved more than $200,000,000 to the taxpayers.

OMNIBUS BILL

It is unfortunate that all of the economy program was thrown together in one bill. I protested against this course. However, the President, Secretary Mills, and other administrative officials, together with a few Democrats, urged an omnibus bill containing many controversial matters. I warned them against the very results that followed, suggesting, in view of the many controversial items in the bill, the possibility of a coalition of those opposed to various items which would endanger, if not destroy, the entire program. As the bill finally passed the House of Representatives it was a hollow pretense, a sham, and a farce. Members of the House did not capriciously wreck it, but each voted conscientiously and doubtless responded to what he believed to be the sentiment in his district. This, however, is now water over the wheel.

No Member of Congress finds any satisfaction in raising taxes or increasing the burdens of the American people. But we have reached a period when it must be done, and in order that the burden may be lightened, it is imperative that the cost of Government must be cut ruthlessly, even though it bring temporary hardship to a considerable number of people.

DIFFICULTY IN CURTAILMENT

In the course of the committee's deliberations we have found that it is difficult, if not almost impossible, to curtail the multiplied activities of the Federal Government. Every item we touched appeared to be a sore spot, and every representative of each bureau under consideration protested vigorously against its restriction. In some instances even members of the President's Cabinet protested against bills designed for economy. Our committee set about in a nonpartisan way to consolidate and coordinate within departments, and to eliminate activities which are not now absolutely essential. In the committee's deliberations, we invited the cooperation of the President of the United States and many of his suggestions were included in our program. And yet, in addition to objections of the bureaus themselves, in almost every instance, we were deluged with telegrams from every section of the country urging that this or that bureau be not disturbed. Of course, much of this is chargeable to the high-powered propagandist, the organized minority, and the bureaucrat himself, these three who have always successfully forced legislation for the benefit of classes and groups, and who are gradually destroying the representative form of our Government.

DANGEROUS TENDENCIES

The tendency within recent years to have the powerful hand of Uncle Sam reach out and touch almost every phase of human life is not only a costly but a dangerous one. Such a tendency is lulling into inertia and indifference our local governments and community responsibility and is challenging the perpetuity of our form of government, which we would all preserve for our children's children.

After the Great War the Old World needed our raw materials and finished products at our own price. Our business expanded, industries multiplied, values enhanced, and our people grew wealthy. The humblest citizen of America enjoyed in his everyday life comforts and conveniences which were luxuries in every other nation in the world. Money came easily, it went recklessly, while thrift seemed to have been entirely forgotten. The time has now come for those of us connected with the Government to get our feet on the ground. Of course, many millions of our citizens not only now have their feet literally on the ground but are actually barefooted.

COSTS HAVE MOUNTED

I have no desire to call names nor make charges, but I confess it is appalling to review the extravagance of the past 12 years in the conduct of Federal affairs. It would seem that those who expanded our departments and bureaus to their present swollen proportions conceived there was no bottom to the national purse. Despite continued talk of economy during recent years we have had constant increases in the maintenance cost of every branch of the Government, while bureaus and commissions have multiplied, until there are now approximately 200, which are ever demanding more expansion and more authority.

OVERMANNED AND TOP-HEAVY

Time will not now permit the recital of even a partial list of the items of this spendthrift orgy; yet I might sight, merely as an example, that the number of Federal employees in the District of Columbia has increased from approximately 32,000 in 1915 to 70,000 in 1932. It is a mystery to me why any branch of the Government that was able to function with smaller appropriations at a time of huge prosperity should require so much more or even as much money to administer its affairs in a period of poverty. Congress has been accused of callous indifference to the sufferings of the people because we suggested a reduction in the Federal pay roll, which is now $1,315,000,000 in round numbers, or approximately one-fourth of the total cost of government. How much is a billion? To give you an idea, it has been, including this hour, only 1,013,446,800 minutes since Jesus Christ was born.

No one will deny that our Government is overmanned and top-heavy, and the taxpayers who pay for all government activities, as well as the salaries of Federal employees, are demanding the elimination of all extravagances despite the protests and almost tearful remonstrances from every department and independent establishment to which it is sought to apply the pruning knife.

Whatever criticism that may apply to Congress in its efforts to reduce Government expenses should apply to those who made these expenses necessary rather than to Congress, on whose doorstep a $2,000,000,000 deficit has been dumped with a demand that we enact legislation to meet it. It is regrettable the message of the President, which you will read to-morrow, was not sent to Congress with his Budget message when we first convened instead of it at this late hour.

Is our President willing to play politics with a question so vital as economy at a time like this?

While former Congresses and administrations must assume responsibility for the expansion of governmental activities, in fairness it must be said that much of this expansion has come through a demand of the people themselves. Therefore, the question now arises, Are the people of the United States willing to deny themselves at least some of the many benefits now extended to them by the Federal Government? These benefits must be denied or the people must continue to furnish the money with which to pay for them. We can not have our pie and eat it, too.

REDUCTION IN SALARIES

One of the methods proposed by the Economy Committee to reduce expenditures was to make a small cut in Federal salaries. On our total Federal pay roll of $1,315,000,000 a 10 per cent reduction for the next fiscal year would mean a saving of $131,500,000. The cost of living has been reduced far more than 10 per cent in the last year. With due deference to our Federal employees, who are patriotic, it would seem that any man or woman who is fortunate enough to be on the pay roll of the Government should be willing to make some small sacrifice in this hour of the Nation's financial distress.

The Federal employee in Washington, under present statutes, gets paid for 365 days in the year while he may work only 221, counting his annual leave with pay, his sick leave, Sundays, legal and half holidays. In some field services outside of Washington the leave is less, but, taken as a whole, Federal employees as a class are the most favored workers in the United States. After all, fellow citizens, who is the Government? It is all the people, and all of us, in the last analysis, pay the bills, regardless of where or to whom the taxes are applied.

Industries, business, State, counties, municipalities, schools, and even the churches have been compelled to cut the salaries of their employees, while 2,000,000 railway employees have already accepted a 10 per cent wage reduction. Then why should not we, the employees of the Federal Government, assume our proportionate share of the burdens of government in the hour of its need?

A PATRIOTIC DUTY

Effecting economies in government is not a partisan task. It is a patriotic duty. Without regard to party lines, without any effort to claim partisan credit or evade responsibility, this tremendous problem challenges our best thought and rests not only on every Member of Congress but upon the entire citizenship of the United States. I thank you.

THE MORATORIUM

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a radio address by my colleague, Mr. ROMJUE.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered over the radio by my colleague from Missouri [Mr. ROMJUE] on April 26, 1932, together with the introductory remarks:

INTRODUCTION BY THE ANNOUNCER OF RADIO STATION WJSV

To-night I am to have the pleasure of presenting to you one of our typical American citizens whose ancestory dates back in this country to the days of the Revolution, when those from whom he is directly descended helped to win our independence. In times like these we turn with special interest to the opinions of the old original stock that formed the foundation of our country.

Mr. ROMJUE has spent a great deal of time in the study of foreign affairs. He has promised to answer some of the questions that are arising in the minds of most of us as June 30 approaches. I refer, of course, to questions concerning the moratorium on foreign debts to the United States that must soon either terminate or be continued.

Ladies and gentlemen, I have the honor of presenting the Hon. M. A. ROMJUE, of Missouri.

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. MILTON A. ROMJUE, OF MISSOURI

Mr. ROMJUE. Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, it gives me pleasure to attempt to answer the questions which are to be propounded to me this evening, and I shall endeavor to answer them to the best of my ability.

Question. Mr. ROMJUE, to refresh our memories, will you describe briefly what is meant by the moratorium?

Answer. At the end of the World War there was an adjustment on paper of the terms and conditions that formed the basis of settlement of obligations and liabilities existing between the nations directly involved in the war. Since that agreement to pay the indebtedness and meet the obligations in a manner stipulated, the professed attitude of the Allies has been that they are willing to pay the war debts to the United States, provided Germany would pay the reparations due the Allies. The general attitude of our own country has been that the war debts due us have no official connection with the reparations due by Germany to the Allies, that they have been contracted independent by the various countries, and that if the Allies do not pay, this burden will have to be shouldered by the American taxpayers. While legally no connection exists between the reparations and allied war debts, the two problems have in recent years been handled as one. The declaration of the moratorium by President Hoover was an indication of the connection between the reparation and war debts. The moratorium granted to the foreign governments by President Hoover for a year will expire about the last of June this year. The moratorium amounted to a postponement of the payments by the foreign governments to this country of the indebtedness due us, which they had promised to pay in installments.

Question. Do you consider that the moratorium on foreign debts has had any effect on the financial conditions of our country?

Answer. Yes; the effect has been quite the opposite to what it was represented it would be by those who favored it. It has been almost a year since the moratorium was granted, and instead of conditions improving, just the reverse has happened. England to-day has a surplus in her treasury and our country has a deficit of about $2,000,000,000. England is paying to private parties the debts she owes them, but as to our country we wait for her to pay us, meantime we tax our own people to meet our deficiency. It is a bit strange that a nation with an empty treasury should postpone payment of a debt to it by a nation which has a surplus in its treasury. France has so well managed her business affairs and given the farmers of her country the same consideration that industry has received, and her credit and stability is as good as can be found in the world; her bonds are selling at a greater premium than our own in the markets of the world, yet we granted a moratorium to France.

Question: If the moratorium were to be continued after the expiration of the year for which it was granted, what would be the effect upon the United States?

Answer. If such happened it would lead our country just that much nearer to the ultimate cancellation of debts which the foreign countries owe us. They should not be canceled, but that's the road laid out for the people to travel, even though the bitterness of a business depression is used in persuasion.

Question. If the moratorium were discontinued, is it true that we should lose more than we gain through the loss of good will?

Answer. Nations are like individuals; if you have to give them something to have their good will, you are never sure of their good will even after you have given them something; and the more you give them, unless you indefinitely continue the policy of giving, the more sure you are to have their ill will in the last analysis.

At the close of the World War Germany was obligated to pay according to the treaty made at the time. Since that time the Dawes Commission made a readjustment of the indebtedness which not only this country but Germany felt sure, so far as expressions went, that the revised amount could be paid. And again the question was raised as to Germany's inability to pay and another readjustment was had under what is known as the Young plan. It was the judgment of our country and Germany and other nations involved, that the indebtedness could be paid. Then again in due time incapacity to pay was asserted; then the granting of the moratorium, and it will continue to be inability to pay, inability to pay, inability to pay, for the purpose of getting Uncle Sam to cancel the indebtedness.

Question. Do you consider there has been any flight of capital from this country?

Answer. Yes; American capital or money in considerable quantities has been invested in foreign industry and foreign securities. The fact is that there is more American money invested in foreign territory and their foreign securities and enterprises than the entire indebtedness amounted to on the part of our own Government at the end of the World War. The investments are sufficient in amount to have entirely liquidated all the indebtedness of our own Government existing at the end of the world conflict, and enough would be left over were it in the United States Treasury to constitute a handsome surplus.

Question. What significance has this flight of capital and what are some of the causes?

Answer. It signifies that American money has been going into foreign fields and leaving the home markets, business, and industry, the owners of American capital evidently believing that a better return might be had on their investment. They have not taken into consideration that their capital was created and their vast wealth accumulated and their business developed and protected in our own country. The greater reason, however, that American capital has gone abroad in the last two or three years is due to the fact that much of our trade and our own home or domestic market have been seriously impaired, and in fact wellnigh destroyed in some particulars. And especially is this true as to the value and selling price of farm products and labor, and this policy has brought a large amount of unemployment.

Question. Do you think the present tariff law has any bearing on our trade and unemployment?

Answer. In my opinion the extraordinarily high tariff law that was passed in this country in 1929 caused many other leading nations of the world to retaliate against us, and since by our high tariff law we have prohibited them from selling or exchanging goods or commodities with us they have raised their tariff so high that we can not sell and ship to them the products of our own farms and factories, for the reason that we are unable to pay the high tariff set up against us. Thus the country's trade has been largely destroyed and broken down, leaving in our own country many people unemployed and hungry while our granaries and stores are filled with a surplus.

This high-tariff situation has resulted in one of the greatest automobile manufacturers going to other countries increasing its output of tractors, automobiles, and automobile accessories. Paying American capital to foreign labor in foreign fields while our own American men in many instances are unemployed. For the same reason has an aluminum factory been established in Canada on American capital, operating there and paying wages to Canadian labor for work that could and should be done in our own country by American workingmen. Examples of this kind could be multiplied by the score. But what is the use of multiplying them, we have reached that period when people must suffer much before they think. We are living in the tongue age it seems, and it has been notably said, "Men have lost their reason."

Question. Mr. ROMJUE, as your time is short and you will not have time to go into detail, would you mind to state briefly what you think should be done to better our country's present condition?

Answer. The President of the United States should call a conference of representatives of the various leading nations of the world to work out a paring down of present high tariffs existing between countires, and such legislative enactments should then be recommended as to put the judgment of that conference into operation. If such were done, trade would be revived, commerce would begin to move, transportation would be enlivened, men would begin to obtain employment, Germany and other nations could exchange their commodities and sell them in the markets, and likewise our own country would be getting rid of its surplus farm and factory products. Credit would soon begin to expand, and nations that owe us could begin again to pay their obligation, and the Government would not have to be burdening the people with more taxes. Business would soon be restored to its past activity, and our country would be getting out of debt instead of in.

The hour demands another Jackson, the only President that ever got our country entirely out of debt; a Jackson of courage, a Jackson from the ranks, a fearless Jackson, one who could swear a bit if nothing else would sufficiently emphasize what had to and must be done.

We have lost our foreign markets and they must be regained. There has been a reduction in our factory output and the demand for the production of the farm has declined, since men have been unemployed; and as I said before, our factories and capital are moving to other countries to get beyond our Chinese tariff wall. Last week the representative of a British chamber of commerce came to this country to pick up American factories for England, and offering desirable sites. Think of it, my friends! American money to be used in employing British labor to reduce the unemployment in England and to help the English farmers and merchants by increasing the purchasing power of English workmen, while our own workmen remain idle.

MUSCLE SHOALS AND MEN OF MARK

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, taking a retrospective view of the long years of struggle to bring about legislation on Muscle Shoals, I am forcibly reminded of several men whose work upon the Committee on Military Affairs in connection with Muscle Shoals legislation has been outstanding.

I stand with bared head and reverent heart in memory of Julius Kahn, distinguished as chairman and as legislator; of Percy E. Quin, beloved and loyal Representative and chairman of this committee; and Harry W. Wurzbach, faithful Member and prudent legislator. These good and true men have gone to their reward, but all that we hope may come in the way of blessing and betterment to at least a large part of our country through the ultimate operation of Muscle Shoals will be, in part at least, a monument to their memory.

Let me also bear testimony to the fidelity and industry of FRANK JAMES, of Michigan, in his work for Muscle Shoals. This patriot, this public servant, this friend, has through all the years since the Muscle Shoals project was inaugurated held firmly to his faith in its useful future. When others became discouraged, Mr. JAMES continued to work and to plan. When others felt disposed to give up the fight against special and selfish predatory interests, it was FRANK JAMES who rallied unselfish and patriotic men around him to continue the struggle to lease the plant for private operation upon terms that would protect the present and future generations of this Nation. FRANK JAMES mastered every detail of the intricate subject. He seems to know almost by memory tens of thousands of pages of printed hearings. Facts long since forgotten by others stand out clear in the memory of FRANK JAMES.

We believe that the bill yesterday passed by the House of Representatives, if enacted into law without serious modification, will begin the development of a great fertilizer and chemical industry at and near Muscle Shoals. By reason of the ultimate construction of Cove Creek, many other power developments will be made along the Tennessee River, and in less than 50 years that valley, so rich in mineral resources and in power possibilities, will prove to be one of the richest sections of the world.

With unrivaled climate, with the purest of water, with productive soil, and with a population of pure Anglo-Saxon strain to draw upon from the surrounding country, the Tennessee Valley holds a promise for greatness that will rival, if not surpass, any other industrial section of the world. When this comes to pass the name of FRANK JAMES should be writ large upon and last long in the hearts of a grateful people.

In this connection the work of our beloved friend and colleague, DANIEL E. GARRETT, of Texas, deserves not mere mention but highest commendation. With profound legal attainments, with unusual common sense, with unselfish devotion to national defense and the cause of agriculture, Mr. GARRETT through all the years of his membership on the Committee on Military Affairs gave his best in seeking to work out some sound and sane solution of this long-standing Muscle Shoals problem. It was highly fitting that the Speaker should call DANIEL E. GARRETT to preside as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union in the consideration of this Muscle Shoals bill, and the dignity, ability, and alertness with which he presided reflected additional credit upon his career in Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I dare not conclude this retrospect without recording my sincere appreciation of the splendid services rendered by the Hon. LISTER HILL, of Alabama. Though relatively young in years, all of his service as a Member of Congress for about 10 years has been upon the Committee on Military Affairs, and during that time first and foremost in his affection and effort has been Muscle Shoals. I testify that through all these years he has consistently stood by the high principles of national defense and the genuine relief of agriculture through the production of concentrated fertilizers at the lowest possible prices.

LISTER HILL has labored with us faithfully and enthusiastically to preserve Muscle Shoals as a great heritage of the people, as a great God-given natural resource, and to prevent it from falling into the hands of selfish and designing interests. When the present Congress convened and the Democratic Party took control of the machinery of the House of Representatives, and when untimely death robbed us of the leadership and inspiration of beloved Percy Quin, I, as his successor, appointed LISTER HILL chairman of a subcommittee of seven, consisting of four Democrats and three Republicans, to prepare, under general instructions, a bill to provide for the disposition of Muscle Shoals. The committee had already held hearings continuing through a month or more, and the subcommittee was in almost continuous session for four or five weeks.

Though I did not attend the sessions of the subcommittee and was in its presence only twice—for a few minutes each time—yet I kept closely in touch with the work going on in that subcommittee. I, therefore, know of the great tact and the splendid leadership manifested by Mr. HILL in that difficult and trying position. Naturally, there were many conflicting views as to what ought to be done and as to how it ought to be done. It was a difficult and tedious task to reconcile these views. Many times whole days would be consumed in trying to settle one single proposition. Then it would take other days to find language appropriate to express the principle already agreed upon. During these weary weeks of hard work, LISTER HILL preserved amiable patience, and displayed a spirit of conciliation that marks him as a man of great usefulness. The debate upon the floor of the House demonstrated to all Members that LISTER HILL knows the facts concerning Muscle Shoals, the "ins and outs" of its history, the forces and influences that have heretofore prevented action, and the bill that bears his name blazes the way for the settlement of a question that the people of all sections and all parties and well-nigh all interests now demand shall be disposed of and the decks cleared for development and industrial progress, not only at Muscle Shoals but up and down the whole Tennessee Valley.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi about the program to-morrow.

Mr. COLLINS. It is our thought to let the general debate run through to-morrow.

Mr. SNELL. Is the gentleman going to explain the bill or just have politics the same as we had to-day? A great many Members would like to know, because they would like to do something else if that is the program.

Mr. COLLINS. It is our thought to let general debate run through to-morrow.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman does not expect to explain the bill himself to-morrow?

Mr. COLLINS. No.

The SPEAKER. Is there any disposition to close debate at any particular time?

Mr. SNELL. There does not seem to be.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate may continue throughout to-morrow, and on Tuesday the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] may be permitted to speak on the bill, and I be permitted to explain the bill to the House.

Mr. SNELL. How long are those two speeches to be? Will they take an hour apiece?

Mr. COLLINS. It will take longer than an hour for me to explain the bill.

Mr. SNELL. Why does not the gentleman use to-morrow instead of wasting the whole day?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi does not make a definite request. Will it occupy more than three hours?

Mr. COLLINS. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will ask unanimous consent for three hours on Tuesday.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, may I ask when the new rule relating to private bills will go into effect?

The SPEAKER. That is a question of recognition.

Mr. COLLINS. I will say, Mr. Speaker, that we have many requests for time, and if granted it will take longer than the working hours of to-morrow.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, I have asked for some time, and the gentleman from California has graciously given it to me. I shall not take that time, however, if, as my colleague from New York says, we are wasting time. The President of the United States has made a statement to the country. It seems to me that Members of the House who have taken an active part in legislation at which the President slurs ought to have an opportunity of replying by giving facts and figures without being referred to as wasting the time of the House, and I resent that insinuation by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL]. And I might say in passing that perhaps if the gentleman from New York had informed the President of the real conditions in this House, the President would perhaps have known that there was no need or justification for that message.

Mr. SNELL. I thank the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that general debate on the Army appropriation bill continue through to-morrow and for three hours on Tuesday, to be equally divided between himself and the gentleman from California. Is there objection?

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, are the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] and the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] to be the only two gentlemen who will speak on the merits of the legislation?

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen getting the floor in general debate control their own remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, May 7, 1932, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

552. Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of War transmitting a report dated May 4, 1932, from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on preliminary examination and survey of old channel of the River Rouge, Mich., was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. THOMASON: Committee on Military Affairs. S. 4235. An act to aid the Grand Army of the Republic in its Memorial Day services, May 30, 1932; without amendment (Rept. No. 1229). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. MONTET: Committee on Military Affairs. H. R. 817. A bill for the relief of Irving Lindsay Leafe; with amendment (Rept. No. 1230). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. BLACK: Committee on Claims. H. R. 919. A bill for the relief of Charles J. Eisenhauer; with amendment (Rept. No. 1231). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. BLACK: Committee on Claims. H. R. 10101. A bill for the relief of Don C. Fees; without amendment (Rept. No. 1232). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. THOMASON: Committee on Military Affairs. S. 1975. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to recognize the high public service rendered by Maj. Walter Reed and those associated with him in the discovery of the cause and means of transmission of yellow fever," approved February 28, 1929, as amended, by including Roger P. Ames among those honored by said act; without amendment (Rept. No. 1233). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia: Committee on Military Affairs. H. R. 4109. A bill for the relief of Abram L. Gerson (Abe A. Gerson); with amendment (Rept. No. 1234). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT: Committee on the Public Lands: H. R. 637. A bill to relinquish the title of the United States to certain lands in the county of Los Angeles, State of California; without amendment (Rept. No. 1235). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. HOWARD: A bill (H. R. 11922) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to make payment of part of the expense incurred in securing improvements in drainage project of drainage district No. 1, Richardson County, Nebr., and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. KNUTSON: A bill (H. R. 11923) to cancel all interest charges upon loans made upon adjusted-service certificates and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

My Mr. DIES: A bill (H. R. 11924) to provide for the exclusion and expulsion of alien communists; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. GARBER: A bill (H. R. 11925) conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to adjudicate the rights of the Otoe and Missouria Tribes of Indians to compensation on a basis of guardian and ward; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. LEWIS: A bill (H. R. 11926) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in assisting persons, including veterans of the World War, who are suffering from hardship caused by unemployment, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. KURTZ: A bill (H. R. 11927) to authorize the erection of a United States Veterans' Administration hospital in the county of Blair, Centre, Clearfield, or Cambria, State of Pennsylvania; to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. COLE of Maryland: A bill (H. R. 11928) for the relief of Carl F. Meinecke; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GREENWOOD: A bill (H. R. 11929) granting a pension to Anna Fletcher; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HADLEY: A bill (H. R. 11930) to provide a preliminary examination of the Green River, Wash., with a view to the control of its floods; to the Committee on Flood Control.

By Mr. HANCOCK of New York: A bill (H. R. 11931) granting an increase of pension to Bridget Haley; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11932) granting an increase of pension to Jennie V. Myers; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11933) granting an increase of pension to Catherine B. McCarthy; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LINTHICUM: A bill (H. R. 11934) granting a pension to Lydia E. Boehmer; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MAY: A bill (H. R. 11935) granting a pension to William Patrick; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NORTON: A bill (H. R. 11936) granting a pension to Benjamin C. Reeve; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PARSONS: A bill (H. R. 11937) granting an increase of pension to Nancy Fopay; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PRALL: A bill (H. R. 11938) providing for an examination and survey of New York and New Jersey Channels, N. Y. and N. J.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. Reid of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 11939) to renew and extend certain letters patent to Charles Douglas Caughron; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee: A bill (H. R. 11940) granting a pension to James G. Elza; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. THOMASON: A bill (H. R. 11941) for the relief of A. C. Francis; to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

7565. By Mr. CHRISTGAU: Resolution adopted by the Albert Lea Chapter of Future Farmers of America, Albert Lea., Minn., urging the continuance of the Federal appropriation for maintaining the program of vocational education in the United States; to the Committee on Appropriations.

7566. Also, resolution adopted by the Caledonia Post, No. 1757, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, Caledonia, Minn., urging that favorable action be taken on the measure providing for the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7567. Also, petition adopted by the members of the Wabasha Post, No. 50, American Legion, Wabasha, Minn., urging that favorable action be taken on the measure providing for the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7568. Also, resolution adopted by members of the Wells Peterson Post, No. 384, of American Legion, Dodge Center, Minn., at a meeting held on February 18, 1932, urging that favorable action be taken on the measure providing for the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7569. Also, petition signed by members of the Wells-Peterson Post, No. 384, Dodge Center, Minn., urging that favorable action be taken on the measure providing for the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7570. Also, resolution adopted by the Hugh Watson Post, No. 190, American Legion, St. Charles, Minn., at its regular meeting on March 30, 1932, urging that favorable action be taken on the measure providing for the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7571. Also, resolution adopted by the Leon J. Weitzel Post, No. 9, Department of Minnesota, American Legion, Winona, Minn., urging that favorable action be taken on the measure providing for the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7572. Also, petition signed by various members of the Langemo Post, No. 295, American Legion, West Concord, Minn., urging that favorable action be taken on the measure providing for the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7573. Also, petition signed by various members of the American Legion Post, No. 90, Lewiston, Minn., urging that favorable action be taken on the measure providing for the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7574. Also, resolution adopted by members of the Arnt Dyrdahl Post, No. 249, American Legion, Spring Grove, Minn., urging that favorable action be taken on the proposal providing for the immediate payment in full of the adjusted-compensation certificates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7575. Also, petition signed by various members of the Arnet Sheldon Post, No. 423, American Legion, Department of Minnesota, Houston, Minn., urging that favorable action be taken on the measure providing for the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7576. By Mr. CULLEN: Petition of the Joshua Earl Sipes Post, No. 505, American Legion, Curwensville, Pa., urging the Congress to favor the immediate passage of the cash payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7577. By Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT: Petition of Hon. George J. Hatfield, secretary-general Republican Service League of California, opposing Senate bill 3769; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

7578. By Mr. JAMES: Telegram from James A. Byrne, commander Upper Peninsula Association of American Legion Posts of Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., opposing contemplated elimination of 2,000 Army officers, Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and citizens' military training camps from Army appropriation bill now before the House; to the Committee on Appropriations.

7579. Also, telegram from Mrs. Irving Field, legislative chairman American Legion Auxiliary, Department of Michigan, Crystal Falls, Mich., protesting curtailment of funds for elimination of citizens' military training camps and Reserve Officers' Training Corps; to the Committee on Appropriations.

7580. By Mr. LINDSAY: Petition of Ryder & Brown Co., Boston, Mass., referring to wool and mohair; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7581. Also, petition of Joshua Earl Sipes Post, No. 505, Curwensville, Pa., favoring the cash payments of the adjusted-service certificates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7582. Also, petition of the American Bankers Association, New York City, favoring certain amendments to the Glass bill, S. 4412; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

7583. Also, petition of the National Economy Committee, New York City, favoring drastic reductions in appropriations for non-service-connected disabilities; to the Committee on Appropriations.

7584. By Mr. McCORMACK: Petition of Yankee Division Post, No. 290, the American Legion, 200 Huntington Avenue, Boston, Mass., H. Guy Watts, adjutant, unanimously recommending enactment of legislation for the immediate payment of the remainder of the adjusted-compensation certificates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7585. By Mr. NIEDRINGHAUS: Petition of 36 citizens of St. Louis, urging immediate cash payment of adjusted-service certificates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7586. By Mr. RUDD: Petition of the National Economy Committee, favoring immediate drastic reduction of appropriations for veterans with non-service-connected disabilities; to the Committee on Appropriations.

7587. Also, petition of Joshua Earl Sipes Post, No. 505, Curwensville, Pa., favoring the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7588. Also, petition of Chamber of Commerce of the Borough of Queens, city of New York, opposing the payment of the so-called soldiers' bonus; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

7589. Also, petition of National Wholesale Food Distributors' Association, New York City, opposing House bills 8874, 8875, and 10674; to the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries.

7590. Also, petition of Raisler Heating Co., New York City, favoring the passage of House bill 9975 and Senate bill 4342; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

7591. Also, petition of the American Bankers' Association, New York City, approving certain amendments to the Glass bill, S. 4412; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

7592. Also, petition of R. E. Earnest, president Association Army Employees, Governors Island, N. Y., opposing the elimination of the citizens' military training camps; to the Committee on Appropriations.

7593. Also, petition of Ryder & Brown Co., Boston, Mass., referring to wool and mohair; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, MAY 7, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We pray Thee, our Father in Heaven, that we may always abound in understanding, in wisdom, and in achievements for the stability of the Republic. It is thus that the fruits of the industries of life are wrought out which abide in success and satisfaction. For these we lift our heart and voice to Thee, O God. Direct all the labors contemplated by this Congress. Vouchsafe Thy special presence in the deliberations of all committees. Withhold not Thy counsel, O God. In Thee we live and move and have our being, and from Thee let the inspiration flow. Keep us steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord. Through patience may we endure and enter into that fellowship which is beyond all other blessings, even as the flower transcends the leaf. In the name of our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 51. An act to authorize the building up of the United States Navy to the strength permitted by the Washington and London naval treaties.

SENATE ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to an enrolled bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 283. An act to provide for conveyance of a certain strip of land on Fenwick Island, Sussex County, State of Delaware, for roadway purposes.

CONSTRUING SECTION 503 (B), TARIFF ACT 1930

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of an emergency United States Government resolution (H. J. Res. 336) construing section 503 (d) of the tariff act of 1930. This joint resolution has the unanimous support of the Committee on Ways and Means. I do not think it will require 10 minutes.

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, what does the joint resolution deal with?

Mr. CRISP. Under a decision of the United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, recently rendered in the Friedlaender case, whenever goods are entered into the United States, and the United States Government and the importer differ as to the appraised value and an appeal is taken, under a construction of provision 503 of the tariff act the court has held that all future entries of similar goods can not be delivered, but must be held in the customhouse awaiting final decision on the test case. Sometimes it will be one or two years before the goods are delivered.

Mr. SNELL. And this will help get some money into the Treasury?

Mr. CRISP. Yes, it will; and it saves the Government the expense of holding all of these packages. The Government will lose nothing, for future importers must give a bond to pay the duty on goods imported.

The Treasury is very much interested in it, and the business world is interested in it, and it is an emergency proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Joint Resolution 336

Resolved, etc., That it was and is the true intent and meaning of section 503 (b) of the act entitled "An act to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, to protect American labor, and for other purposes," approved June 17, 1930, that imported merchandise entered in accordance with the provisions of said section 503 (b) shall be appraised and reappraised in the same manner as though the merchandise was not so entered; that the appraisement and reappraisement of such merchandise shall have the same force and effect as in the case of merchandise not so entered; and that entries covered by certification of the importer as provided in said section 503 (b) shall be liquidated in accordance with the final appraised value of the merchandise covered by such certificates.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point the report which contains a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury in explanation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The report is as follows:

[House of Representatives, Rept. No. 1216, 72d Cong., 1st sess.]

Construing section 503 (b) of the tariff act of 1930

Mr. CRISP, from the Committee on Ways and Means, submitted the following report to accompany H. J. Res. 336:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the resolution (H. J. Res. 336) construing section 503 (b) of the tariff act of 1930, having had the same under consideration, report it back to the House without amendment, and recommend that the resolution do pass.

The purpose of this legislation is fully set forth in the following letter from the Secretary of the Treasury:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, March 15, 1932.

Hon. CHARLES R. CRISP,
Acting Chairman Ways and Means Committee,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I wish most respectfully to call your attention to a serious situation affecting the administration of the revenue laws which seems to require remedial action by the Congress.

Under the tariff administrative laws the importer is required to declare in the entry the proper value of his merchandise, under pain of having additional duties imposed if the value declared is too low. The declared value is not binding upon the Government, but, except as provided in section 503 (b) of the tariff act of 1930, and similar provisions in previous acts, it is binding upon the importer. Section 503 (b) permits an importer who has an appeal to reappraisement pending to enter subsequent shipments under certificate at the value found by the appraiser in the appeal case, thereby avoiding the possibility of additional duties if the appraiser is sustained on final reappraisement and at the same time escaping the binding force of his entered value if the importer's contention in the appeal case is sustained.

In a recent decision of the United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, in the case of Friedlaender Co. v. The United States (not yet published), it was held that the appraiser must suspend appraisement of merchandise covered by entries made under certificate until the appeal in the so-called "test" case is finally decided, and that any appraisement of the merchandise prior to that time is illegal and void.

The principal result of this decision will be that the packages designated for examination by the appraiser, which may amount to 10 per cent or more, can not be released until the final decision in the test case, inasmuch as section 499 of the tariff act provides that imported merchandise shall not be delivered until it has been examined and appraised.

The attention of the court was invited to the fact that a ruling such as made by it would render the statute impracticable of administration and would cause endless delay in the release of examination packages and, no doubt, would necessitate the leasing of additional storage space and the payment of storage charges by the Government. The court, however, stated that:

"It is argued here, with much vigor, that to hold duress entries in abeyance until the test cases referred to have been decided will entail upon the Government the burden of keeping in the appraisers' stores at the ports, for long periods, the packages forwarded for examination; that frequently long periods elapse before the test case or cases are decided; that such a holding prevents the importer, for long periods, from obtaining his said examination packages.

"These are not matters which we may remedy here. The remedy, if any is needed, lies with the legislative and not with the judicial department of the Government. If delays exist in the trial of duress cases, extending into years, as detailed by affiants Thomas and Thurston, and as insisted upon by counsel for the Government, this is an unfortunate condition and one that should enlist legislative assistance. This court, however, is concerned alone in attempting to properly construe the laws which Congress has enacted, so that their provisions may be effective if possible."

In view of all the circumstances, it is believed that the appropriate remedy is a legislative construction of section 503 (b) which will render it workable and obviate the difficulties heretofore enumerated. It is also believed that such legislative construction should take the form of a joint resolution rather than an amendment to the law. A joint resolution has, therefore, been prepared, the text of which is as follows:

"Joint resolution construing section 503 (b) of the tariff act of 1930

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it was and is the true intent and meaning of section 503 (b) of the act entitled 'An act to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, to protect American labor, and for other purposes,' approved June 17, 1930, that imported merchandise entered in accordance with the provisions of said section 503 (b) shall be appraised and reappraised in the same manner as though the merchandise was not so entered; that the appraisement and reappraisement of such merchandise shall have the same force and effect as in the case of merchandise not so entered; and that entries covered by certification of the importer as provided in said section 503 (b) shall be liquidated in accordance with the final appraised value of the merchandise covered by such certificates."

The construction placed upon the law by this proposed resolution is in accord with the department's view as to the intent of the Congress in enacting section 503 (b) and with the practice which has been followed by it since this legislation was first adopted in the act of 1913.

In view of the importance of this matter, I suggest that, if it may be consistently done, the proposed joint resolution be given immediate consideration and be passed without delay. If you desire any further information or explanation, I shall be glad to designate an official of the department to confer with you.

A copy of this letter has been sent to the Hon. REED SMOOT, chairman Committee on Finance, United States Senate.

Very truly yours,

OGDEN L. MILLS,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Section 503 (b) of the tariff act of 1930 is as follows:

"Entries pending reappraisement: If the importer certifies at the time of entry that he has entered merchandise at a value higher than the value as defined in this act because of advances by the appraiser in similar cases then pending on appeal for reappraisement or rereappraisement, and if the importer's contention in such pending cases shall subsequently be sustained, wholly or in part, by a final decision on reappraisement or rereappraisement, and if it shall appear that such action of the importer or entry was taken in good faith, the collector shall liquidate the entry in accordance with the final appraisement."

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11897), making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11897), with Mr. LANHAM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the subject of national defense.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

THE IMPORTANCE OF COPPER TO NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, copper is of importance in military activities because of its direct use in the manufacture of munitions, equipment, and military articles and its indirect use in the manufacture of generators, motors, steam power plants, engines, telephone, telegraph, and many similar commercial articles which are of extreme importance in war time in connection with the manufacture of the military requirements. The fact that practically 90 per cent of the copper output of the United States was used for both direct and indirect military purposes during the World War indicates better than anything else the intimate connection between an available supply of this material and the execution of a military munitions program.

The various items of equipment and supply for the Army require the use of copper or copper alloys in many ways and for many reasons. The qualities of the metal and its alloys which have led to its adoption are the combination of ability to resist corrosion, the easy working by machining, deep drawing, moderate strength, ductility, low electric resistance, and others.

The use of copper or brass in soldiers' equipment, clothing, and gas masks has been dictated by the noncorrosive qualities as compared with steel. In ordnance it is its easy machinability, its deep-drawing qualities, its noncorrosive qualities as compared with steel or iron, and its ductility which require its use in cartridge cases to prevent escape of powder gases to the rear, combined with sufficient strength to hold those gases without rupture and to hold the bullet or projectile in a single unit to form the complete round for the rifle, machine gun, and field gun. Its ductility in the case of bullet jackets and projectile rotating bands permits the generation of the rotary motion essential to stability and accuracy. In aircraft and automotive engines the quality of noncorrosiveness is paramount in its use in such parts as fuel lines and radiators. In electrical apparatus, transmission, and communication lines the low electrical-resistance property is the one which had dictated its use. In all types of mechanical devices an alloy for use as a bearing or bushing is needed to prevent damage which would result from steel bearing on steel.

The ability to draw copper alloy into thin tubes or to make thin wall castings makes its use highly desirable for this purpose. The use of any substitute is usually attended by a sacrifice of service, strength, ability to produce in quantity, higher cost, or some other equally potent objection. In most cases because of the fact that it has been selected for its various uses as a result of test and experience, substitution would be attended by a loss of efficiency, increase in weight or bulk, and in extreme cases by the possibility of absolute failure. The necessity for making any such change in time of an emergency should be prevented because of the interference with efficient production possibilities that would be caused by making changes and using materials that had not been tried out in practice.

Any situation which will reduce the copper-producing industry of this country to a position where it is unable to supply normal consumption, with a possibility of sufficient expansion to meet the increased demands of an emergency, will add to the difficulties of adequate preparation for national defense. How serious such a situation might prove to be can not be foretold, but it is conceivable that it might place the country in a very difficult position until idle mines could be put into operation and plants rehabilitated. All of this, of course, would mean serious delay and tremendous expense.

Meanwhile the country would have to depend upon stocks on hand, the output of operating plants, and in extremity the gathering of copper and copper alloys from such sources as statues, bells, decorative portions of buildings, roofing, household utensils, and similar sources. This is well illustrated by the following quotation from the Strategy of Minerals, by Smith, which reads as follows:

> The preservation of copper and its conversion to other uses is well illustrated in the Central Empires, where the supply of new copper was very deficient during the war and the deficiency had to be met by taking copper previously in use. Thus roofs were stripped of their copper sheathing, and brass hinges, door trimmings, and other brass, bronze, and copper articles, much used by the Germans and Belgians in building, gave place to substitutes. Some of the copper employed in the telephone, telegraph, electrical, and transportation industries was replaced by substitutes and went into munitions. Articles of sentimental as well as of practical value were sacrificed, such as the household utensils of copper and brass that are so generally used in Germany, many of them highly prized as family heirlooms. Bells of churches and cathedrals in Belgium and northern France, as well as those in the Central Empires, which had summoned generation after generation to worship, were melted to supply the demands of war. It is reported that the monument which for three generations marked the place where the ambitions of Napoleon were shattered on the field of Waterloo was melted down for the copper derived from the French cannon of which it was made, which was thus again used for military purposes.

Any severe restriction on normal uses would, however, have far-reaching consequences in industrial enterprises. There would be need of much redesign of product where substitutions are required with consequent interference with industrial output and the furnishing for commercial use of inferior material.

It is possible that many contemplated uses of copper and copper products can be replaced without material loss of efficiency. Others are absolutely essential and must be provided. Therefore, an operating copper industry producing the major portion of the country's normal needs from domestic materials is one of the greatest aids to national defense. It has been said with correctness that copper is second only to steel as a basic metal required for war. This might be extended so as to list the most essential metals for war as steel, copper, zinc, and lead, of importance in the order named.

The principal ordnance use of copper and copper products is in the manufacture of ammunition. All ordnance design is based on a plentiful supply of steel and copper. These two metals may justly be termed the foundations upon which the ability of the Nation to make war is built. The availability of a supply from domestic sources has been the reason for present developments of war-making materials. Should the supply of copper from domestic sources ever become materially less than the normal peace-time consumption a great change in ordnance design must result.

The rifle of the infantry soldier, the machine gun and automatic rifle which he uses to deliver concentrations of fire impossible to effect from the slow-firing rifle of the individual soldier, the light artillery which supports him in offense and defense, the heavier artillery used for the destruction of enemy guns and longer range fire on roads, railroads, troop concentrations in back areas, ammunition dumps, and all the other important targets located at long distances behind the fighting fronts would all be useless without the ammunition. In fact, the artilleryman deems that his principal weapon is not the gun but the ammunition.

Some of the most essential parts of ammunition are made from copper or alloys consisting largely of copper.

The jacket of the small-arms bullet is of gilding metal, 90 per cent copper. This jacket is essential to contain the lead or steel core and must be a soft metal capable of taking the rifling and yet be stronger than the lead core which by itself would become so deformed in the high-powered rifle or machine gun as to be useless as an accurate projectile. No other metal than a copper base metal can serve this purpose. The cartridge case which holds the propelling charge is of brass composed of about 70 per cent copper. No other alloy or metal so cheap or so available in quantities required possesses the strength, the ability to be drawn to the required shape, and the ability to be crimped to the bullet as brass or some other alloy consisting largely of copper. The primer which holds the igniting charge must be made of copper or a copper alloy. It is true that other metals or alloys could be used, but none would possess the qualities of cheapness, ease of manufacture, ability to be produced in the quantities required, and the satisfactoriness of performance.

In artillery ammunition the brass cartridge case and the primer fulfill the same functions as in the small-arms ammunition. The projectile is given its rotary movement by means of a copper, cupro nickel, or gilding metal band forced into a groove near the base of the projectile. The band, made larger than the bore of the gun, is forced into the spiral grooves of the rifling and gives the projectile a rotation about its axis as it passes down the bore. Point fuses are largely of brass or other copper alloy. No other metal is so satisfactory for the combination of cheapness, strength, and ease of manufacture.

The ordnance ammunition program contemplates the use of approximately three-fourths of the War Department's requirements. A prospect of any lack of adequate supplies of copper will involve a research program to determine usable substitutes and a probability that the quality of our munitions will suffer greatly as a result of substitution. The production of these substitutes would involve a large expenditure of money, power, and labor, an interference with production of needed supplies, and the necessity of using inferior munitions, which in a major emergency may be serious enough to mean the difference between success and failure.

CORPS OF ENGINEERS

Copper and its alloys are also of vital importance to the munitions program of the Corps of Engineers. The majority of the items making up the requirements of this corps are of a commercial nature and require copper because of its outstanding qualifications for the uses to which it is put The low electrical resistance of copper combined with its cheapness have always made it the ideal metal for use in the transmission of electric current and in the construction of electrical generating machinery. A sufficient supply for these purposes is of vital importance. A list of articles used by the Corps of Engineers requiring the use of copper is as follows:

Searchlights; generators; motors; wire and cable; fuses, electric; transformers; switches, electric; electric lights and accessories; miscellaneous electrical appliances; demolition equipment; locomotives; cars, railroad; map-reproduction equipment; drawing instruments; surveying instruments; brasses, car and journal; boilers; engines, gas, oil, and steam; construction plant; cranes and hoists; machine tools and machine-shop equipment; pumps; valves and pipe fittings.

SIGNAL CORPS

In considering the military importance of any raw material one instinctively thinks in terms of the quantity required. To the Signal Corps, however, the importance of copper is not measured in terms of quantity alone, although the estimated requirements disclose figures of impressive size; its importance is that of the entire system of military communications—for without copper electrical communications would not exist.

Of the twenty thousand and odd items of Signal Corps equipment and supplies, copper forms an essential component of over 95 per cent. From the humble dry battery to the superpowerful radio transmitter, copper plays its indispensable rôle in military communications.

Let us as an illustration consider a single item of supply, twisted pair, field telephone wire, known to the service as wire, type W–110. This wire consists of 2 stranded conductors, each consisting of 5 steel and 2 copper strands—a simple description of no particular significance. But let us see what it means in terms of a major military effort. First of all, we see that our estimate of requirements for such an effort calls for over 80,000 miles of field wire in the first 30 days of war and for a war of 2 years' duration this figure grows to over 800,000 miles. In terms of copper, this means that in the space of 2 years, for this one item alone, 10,500,000 pounds of copper must be rolled and drawn into over 3,500,000 miles of wire—over fourteen times the distance from the earth to the moon.

But this figure, impressive though it be, represents only approximately one-sixth of the total copper needed for communications in war, and so far there has been discovered no substitute.

A few years ago we were assured from every billboard, every newspaper, and every theater screen that "Food will win the war." It is perhaps too much to say that "copper will win a war," but we can say without fear of contradiction, that even though copper may not win a war, the lack of copper will most certainly lose it.

The most important items of Signal Corps equipment requiring copper in their manufacture are wire; telephone and telegraph equipment; dry batteries; radio equipment; cable; battery-charging set, ¾-kilowatt, with gas engine; meteorological items; range-finding equipment; and photographic items.

AIR CORPS

A large number of important articles used by the Air Corps require a plentiful supply of copper. Copper sheet is used in aircraft radiators for shims, washers, and sheathing. Wire is employed for electrical purposes. Tubing is found in radiators, and in oil, water, gasoline, and oxygen line connections. In bronze alloys it is used for landing-gear and tail-skid fittings, caps, brackets, and so forth. It is particularly useful in this form in turnbuckles because of its resistance to corrosion, excellent machinability, and tensile strength. In red brass it is used for carburetors and oil-line fittings. In gun metal, copper alloyed with tin and zinc, it is an important bearing material and finds application in airplane wheel bushings and in general for bearings closely fitted and run against hardened and ground steel surfaces.

As phosphor bronze it is also important as a bearing alloy. Alloyed with nickel, iron, and aluminum it is used in aircraft parts requiring extreme hardness and resistance to wear such as valve seats. The use of copper and its alloys is so intimately connected with the design of the equipment in which it is used that a supply of copper must be available for this use to avoid interference of the most serious kind with the manufacture of this equipment. It would not be possible to determine the practicability of using other metals as substitutes without a vast amount of expensive research work and the probability of successful substitution is very doubtful to say the least.

The most important articles of Air Corps equipment requiring copper or its alloys in their manufacture are:

Airplanes, aircraft engines, airships, balloons, engines, generators, airplane wheels, bomb racks, bomb sight, bomb shackle, engine controls, radiator filler unit, protographic truck, all electrical connections, photographic developing and printing apparatus, fuel pumps, fuel fittings, landing light, mooring mast, gasoline tank truck.

MEDICAL CORPS

The Medical Corps of the Army uses approximately 125 items which require copper in their manufacture. Some of the more important articles are:

X-ray field unit; X-ray field unit and X-ray machine complete; copper condensers; X-ray machines of various types, such as bedside, dental, and so forth; water bath for large variety of purposes, such as inflammable liquids, inoculations, serological, and so forth; ovens, pathological and drying; distillery apparatus.

QUARTERMASTER CORPS

A large quantity of copper is used in a great variety of articles of military equipment furnished to the soldier by the Quartermaster Corps.

Some of these articles are:

Uniforms, gloves, raincoats, shoes, bandoleers, cartridge belts, canteens, pack carriers, cups, forks, haversacks, meat cans, and water bags.

The indirect relation of copper to a munitions program is of equal importance to the direct one. Commercially, copper is employed in a vast number of ways, especially in the electrical and allied industries, where its high conductivity renders it of greatest value. Its corrosion-resisting property also accounts for its use in boiler and condenser apparatus. The close connection between the need for equipment of this type and the expansion of facilities to meet the increased needs of a military program in war time hardly needs explanation. In fact, there are few, if any, peacetime uses that would not be essential in the indirect activities connected with manufacturing military needs in time of war.

All of the military needs are also essential for naval activities. Here again the corrosion-resisting property of copper and its alloys, combined with strength and toughness, makes it indispensable for use in the manufacture of such items as marine engines, pumps, rams, boiler and condenser tubes, and marine propellers.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I think, in view of the developments in the last two or three days, with reference to one official message that has been sent to the Congress of the United States by the Chief Executive, and also in view of the public statement issued through the press upon yesterday by the President of the United States, both of which, both by direction and by inference, directly attack either the ability and integrity of the Congress of the United States, or by implication, the weakness of the Members of the House of Representatives of the United States, that it is permissible for one who has an old-fashioned conception of the real provisions of the Constitution of the United States to make a few observations with respect to what I conceive to be a gross abuse upon the part of the Executive of the provisions of the Constitution and an invasion of the rights of the Congress of the United States.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER], upon yesterday, made a brief and able reference to the inherent powers of the Executive and to the limitation and restraint imposed by the Constitution upon the powers of the Executive. The gentleman from Missouri ably pointed out in his brief discussion of this phase of the proposition that the founders of our Constitution, in their conception of a Republic dedicated to popular government, intended that the real government of the people of the United States be vested in the law-making branch of the Government and not in the Executive.

The gentleman from Missouri further pointed out how brief were the powers conferred upon the Executive by the provisions of that instrument, and it might well be pointed out that practically all of the powers conferred upon the Executive are those of negation and restraint. I think, in all justice to the Executive, he should take some quiet hour, I think he might well use a few minutes of the time he is writing his indictment against the Congress of the United States, to peruse the provisions of our organic law. [Applause.]

I call your attention to this provision of the Constitution:

> That he shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

There has never been any construction of the real vitality of that provision, either in public forum or by judicial interpretation, that has undertaken even to clothe the Executive, under the authority of that power, to constitute himself into a common scold and to undertake not only to interpret his own powers but to place rebuke and contumely upon the law-making branch of the Government as he has done in the message that he sent to the Congress.

Although disclaimer is entered that there is any spirit of partisanship actuating the President in these messages that he has sent to the Congress, it is my opinion that it was deliberately conceived as a political maneuver. There is an old impression extant in this country that the Executive is always more popular with the people than the Congress of the United States. I believe that I am justified in asserting from all of the circumstances and surroundings now confronting the country that the President is undertaking to play a last trump card in invoking that belief.

Where does the Executive of this country derive his powers from this Constitution to undertake to set up public opinion in this country in favor of the Executive and against the popular branch of the Government, the representatives of the American people, as he did directly and almost brutally in this message which he sent? There is political reason for it, my friends, because I think it is apparent to the Executive and to his political advisers that his administration in public esteem has been driven against the wall. [Applause.] It is my opinion—for which I alone am responsible, and it may not be supported in the views of other gentlemen—that this is a deliberate effort to resort to the old subterfuge and strategy of undertaking to draw a very malodorous herring across the trail in order to mislead as to the real pursuit.

What is the complaint of the President against the Congress of the United States? He undertakes to set out that we have failed because we refused to go along with him in all of his recommendations. I assert, gentlemen—and I believe the country upon a fair examination of the facts will sustain the assertion—that the Democratic Party in this House and at the other end of the Capitol has voluntarily surrendered some of the political advantage it might have obtained by opposing some of his policies and going along with him as a matter of broad general patriotism, based upon the desperate emergencies of the country. We fell in—at least most of us did on this side—and assisted in passing his moratorium bill, which many of us now look back upon with great regret. We assisted him in passing the great Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill, based as it was upon the broad principle of undertaking, first, to establish confidence in the great financial institutions of the country, with the hope that maybe some of the benefits of that stabilization would trickle down to the common masses of the people of this country. But when we ceased to cooperate with the President in the things he conceives and for which he stands sponsor—if we for one moment, in the exercise of our official functions and under our oaths of office, differ with him, then he issues a great public political manifesto, the purpose of which is to organize public opinion against the Democratic majority in this House and the Congress of the United States. No other legitimate inference can be drawn from it, although there may be some words of disclaimer in the utterance.

When we came back here to assume our duties in this Congress, what situation did we find? Ah, the gentleman from Michigan, the new leader of the Republican side, asserted yesterday, when we undertook to chide the administration for its failure to economize, for its failure to recommend to the Congress of the United States these great reductions which he is now asking—and that was legitimate criticism, because he was supposed to have the facts to sustain these great recommendations of reductions in the public expenditures—when we on this side undertook upon yesterday to point out some of the failures and omissions upon the part of the President himself, the gentleman from Michigan gets up and answers that legitimate indictment by the mere casual suggestion, "Oh, let us forget it; that is water over the wheel."

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It has not been long since the leadership on the majority side was vested in the capable hands of the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut, who, for some reason which has never been satisfactorily explained as far as I know, certainly nothing discreditable to the character and capacity of that distinguished gentleman, was demoted from the Republican leadership. I assume it was upon the presumption that the distinguished titular leader, the gentleman from New York, was a more 2-fisted fighter and that he would be more capable of directing the strategy, policies, and maneuvers of the minority party in this session of Congress, but the gentleman from New York has been strangely silent and inactive during the course of this Congress. I think, knowing him as I do from long and intimate acquaintanceship, the reason for that is that he is an honest and conscientious man, and that he has not been able to find the stomach to stand up here and undertake to take care of this administration. [Applause.]

So the mantle of leadership, the mantle of Elijah, has fallen upon the narrower but no less capable shoulders of the gentleman from Michigan. He gets up here and says, "Oh, let us forget it." Ah, gentlemen, there are a lot of things, I am sure, which the gentleman from Michigan, his administration, and his party associates on this side of the Chamber, would like to forget. They would like to forget the 8,000,000 or 10,000,000 hungry, starving, hopeless, and disillusioned men and women in America to-day without employment. They would like the people of this country to forget the miserable debacle of the President's major program of farm relief, as incorporated in the farm relief bill, which he insisted upon against the advice of all the farm organizations of this country, and through which there has been a willful squandering of that half billion dollars. That is gone and no results have been attained.

They, I am sure, would like to forget the disastrous results upon our foreign trade and upon our domestic economic life of the operation of the Smoot-Hawley bill. I shall not find it necessary to quote any figures to show those disastrous results. They are too well known. Oh, yes; there are a lot of things that my friend from Michigan would like the country to forget. I am sure that even in his sleep he thinks of the language of that Shakespearean tragical character who said, "Out, damned spot! Out, I say!" but it will not out, my friends, in the recollection of the American people.

Now, after that blast that was directed against us in the official message, the President, no doubt thinking he had wielded the big stick a little too hard, undertook to apply a little salve and palliative to the bruises and wounds, and on yesterday, by another statement in which he forgets another provision of our Constitution—the right of petition for the redress of grievances—he says that all of these terrible catastrophes that have fallen upon this Congress have been because the membership has been intimidated by a small group of lobbyists that infested the corridors of the Capitol and persuaded them to do things merely for political effect that in their best judgment were wrong.

Gentlemen, you hear about this swarm of locusts representing labor and men out of employment and Federal employees—they have had no effect on me because I have gone ahead and supported the major economic program—but the President of the United States, my friends, does not take occasion to issue a public manifesto when these lobbyists, not necessarily swarms of lobbyists like swarms of locusts come down here, but when this small and more select and more capable group of lobbyists come down when the Ways and Means Committee is in session making up a tariff bill and when the Ways and Means Committee is in session making up the tax bills of the country—the shrewd, capable, sinister representatives of the great vested interests of the country are here and you know it, but the President does not find it necessary in his conception of his rights for the protection of the weak and tottering American Congress to make any reference to that by a public statement.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. For a very brief statement.

Mr. MAY. And the President made no reference to the members of his Cabinet who were protesting against the programs of the committees to bring about economy.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, no; and it has been pointed out here time and time again that if the President of the United States were as anxious to achieve practical economy through legislative enactment as he professes, he would take up the question of silencing the members of his own immediate, official family when they come up and attempt to frustrate the honest efforts of the Appropriations Committee to curtail and reduce appropriations. [Applause.]

Ah, gentlemen, another way has been found to relieve us of all our troubles—a simple, short, direct method.

This has been supposed to be a constitutional government. It is supposed to be based upon three great coordinate branches of government, separate and distinct in their jurisdiction and in their field of action, but we must discard that now, and a new program is offered. It was suggested in the Senate of the United States a day or two ago by a distinguished Senator who is supposed to be the mouthpiece and spokesman of the administration upon the floor of the other body. I quote his exact language:

> Mr. President, I do not often envy other countries their governments, but I say that if this country ever needed a Mussolini, it needs one now.

Gentlemen, has democracy failed in America? Has representative government, framed and fashioned by our fathers, collapsed in America? Are we to discard the genius of Jefferson and Madison and those who concerted with them in the establishment of our great fundamental law? Has it become necessary, because of some temporary emergency upon the part of the economic situation of our country, to forget all of the judicial interpretations of Marshall and Taney and the great men who have honored the ermine of this country in their interpretation of the Constitution?

Is it possible we have arrived at that evil day when the chief spokesman of an American administration in the Senate of the United States suggests we put off all the forms of constitutional government and try the advantages of a dictator for the American people?

The effort has been made, and I charge again that it was deliberately made, to discredit the Representatives of the American people here in the Congress of the United States simply because, forsooth, acting under their oath of office, acting as they conscientiously concluded after a full consideration of all the facts involved in every particular issue, representing as they did what they conceived to be the best interests of their constituencies, because on some of these problems of government, in all their complicated nature, they have desired to assert the privilege and liberty of expressing their views, it seems it has become necessary for the President of the United States to rebuke and lecture the Congress of the United States for its omission of duties; and they would almost leave the impression we ought to sit here and take it and make no reply.

The House of Representatives, in my opinion, has not yet degenerated to that low level when they shall sit silent, like a bunch of whipped spaniels, under this sort of rebuke and make no reply. As a Representative of a small, rural, humble constituency down in the hills of Alabama, representing men and women dedicated to our system of constitutional government, revering the memories of all the great men who have established it and perpetuated it, believing that in democracy alone, as we have it in our form of government, will be the ultimate salvation of our people, I resent and repudiate the efforts of the President of the United States to bring this body into public disrepute and scorn. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DYER. I would like to inquire how much time has been devoted by the majority in control of legislation to political stump speeches, and the attack on the President——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not a parliamentary inquiry, and the point of order is sustained. The Chair will state for the information of the committee that the gentleman from California has used 1 hour and 36 minutes, and the gentleman from Mississippi 2 hours and 29 minutes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, it is quite evident from the speech made by the gentleman from Alabama and other Democratic leaders that the Democratic fold is in some consternation and disturbance over the President's message. There is another thing that is absolutely true—there must have been some kick in that message, because it has evidently got under the hide of the Democrats at both ends of the Capitol, and they are trying to make some explanation for their actions thus far during the present session of Congress. [Applause.]

The only hope I have in the matter is that the sting is deep enough and will stay there long enough, so that they will appreciate the obligation that they owe to the country, and will give these matters before us at the present time the careful and considerate attention which the country demands. [Applause.]

Now, just a word about the economy program. The President gave out a message two months ago, but unfortunately gave it to the press on Saturday, and it was not to be read to the House until next Wednesday morning.

The Democratic leaders got hold of that statement, and they went into a huddle on Monday morning, and said, "We must beat the President on his economy program." So they rushed around and got a special rule from the Rules Committee for an Economy Committee in the House. For some reason or other that failed, and it did not get set up until the program of the President went to the country.

Unfortunately for the Democratic majority, the country thought that they were carrying out the program of the President, and the President got the better of it, and the Democrats have been sore ever since. [Laughter and applause.]

There has been a good deal said about the President's message.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Gladly.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. How far in round figures would the President's program go toward balancing the Budget?

Mr. SNELL. Which program does the gentleman mean?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The economy program.

Mr. SNELL. But which one?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Any one.

Mr. SNELL. You people challenged the President's economy program, and the President told you where the economy could be made. He did not insist on his own program but was willing to take any program suggested.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. But——

Mr. SNELL. I do not yield any further at the present time. After I get through I will gladly yield for any question by any Member.

They have criticized the President's program and the President's message. I want some one to tell me one sentence, one paragraph, that is not a true statement of facts. [Applause.] I want some one to point to a single sentence that does not paint the picture exactly as it is. Because the President told the truth it hurt you Democrats, and I do not blame you for wincing. Your criticism is that he was not specific, as voiced by my distinguished friend from Alabama, now standing in the center aisle.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman has invited an interruption.

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The President in his message attacked the Congress of the United States for passing the Goldsborough bill. I say to the gentleman from New York that this bill went through the House with practically the unanimous support of his own party. Does the gentleman think that the President was justified in assailing the integrity—I will not say that—but the ability of the Congress of the United States to legislate?

Mr. SNELL. Before I get through this speech, I will tell the gentleman what the newspapers in his own country think about it. I am going to take the Democratic press of the country, and not the partisan Republican press, and tell the gentleman what they think about it, and whether they support the President's criticism or not. My view might be partisan, but certainly the Democratic press is not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask the gentleman not to answer me by citing newspapers. I want the gentleman to give his own answer to it.

Mr. SNELL. I think it is all right. I voted against the bill, and there are a great many other Members wish they had.

Mr. DYER. And we did not know the bill was to be considered until about an hour before it was brought on the floor.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is a fine confession for a legislator to make. [Laughter.]

Mr. SNELL. My friend from Alabama said the President found fault because we did not go along with him. I want the gentleman to show a single sentence in that message that finds fault because we did not go along with him. The only thing he found fault with was because we did not go along with somebody and do what the country demanded we do at the present time.

As a matter of fact, what the country is finding fault with is that Congress evidently does not appreciate conditions in the country and act accordingly. The gentleman talks about the unity on the Republican side. That is almost to laugh. During the first month of this session this Hall resounded every day with Democratic orators telling about the unity and the great leadership on the Democratic side of the House, and until to-day, for some two months, I have not heard a single word about it, and the gentlemen did not say very much about it then. Even the distinguished Speaker had to get down and take the floor the other day after his troops had been routed and they were in ignominious retreat, and it did not do very much good at that. To talk about unity on the Republican side as compared with what it is on the Democratic side is a joke, for on your side you neither have leadership nor unity, and everyone knows it. I say to the gentleman once more, I want him to point out one single statement in that message that is not an actual picture of what exists in this country at the present time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman says that the country is complaining that the Congress is not doing the things they want done. Does the gentleman not think that the country wants the Budget balanced?

Mr. SNELL. And what have we done so far toward balancing it?

Mr. BANKHEAD. We have passed a bill through this House.

Mr. SNELL. Yes; you have passed a bill; but what a bill! You can not do it by simply passing a bill; it must be a measure that will produce something. What did you do with your economy program that your own party brought in here? You scuttled it before it got started.

Mr. McDUFFIE. What did you do with it? [Laughter.]

Mr. SNELL. Yes; I will tell you. I am very glad that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER] made the speech that he did. I expected some such speech as that, and I was getting ready for it all through the consideration of that bill. The bill was written in the Committee of the Whole, and gentlemen know it. There was a time when the chairman of that committee had two men besides himself on the Democratic side supporting his contention, and there were three members of the committee besides himself. Whether they were all on the floor at that time I do not know, but from beginning to end in the Committee of the Whole we had almost 2 votes to 1 in supporting it.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I invite the gentleman to read the record of the votes on the question of the salary reduction and the exemption, and I invite the gentleman to scan the pages of the RECORD with reference to one of the big items in the proposal, which evidently now has the approval of the President, or at least a part of it has his approval, even at this late day, in respect to the Army and Navy. Read the RECORD.

Mr. SNELL. I am glad the gentleman spoke about the exemption. One of the important leaders on the Democratic side told me, "While all of our fellows stood up for that high exemption, they will run when it comes to a roll call," and they did run, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Oh, I think there was just about as much fleetness of foot on the gentleman's side when it came to running, and a little bit more than on the Democratic side.

Mr. SNELL. Oh, no; the gentleman not only knows it but every Member of this House knows it and the newspaper fraternity knows it and the country knows it; and that is why you are being so severely criticized at the present time. You just failed to make good.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I will take care of the gentleman from Texas a little later.

Mr. BLANTON. Just one question.

Mr. SNELL. Not now. Talk about the Army and Navy proposition! That was put in there as a political proposition, and everybody knows it. The Republican Party is opposed to joining the Army and Navy because they stand for national preparedness and defense, and they do not think the proper way of accomplishing that is by joining the Army and the Navy. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. McDUFFIE. And yet a former President of the gentleman's party recommended——

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from New York has not yielded to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Oh, I beg the pardon of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLARD].

Mr. SNELL. If you will give the President the authority that he is asking for, he will make every reduction and do away with every duplication and overlapping there is between those two services, and that is what we can do, and in that way you will accomplish every economy that is possible and not destroy your national defense.

Mr. McDUFFIE rose.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Why did not you give it to him last session when you were in power?

Mr. SNELL. I did not yield to the gentleman from New York. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE].

Mr. McDUFFIE. Of course, seeing the necessity to economize even before this Congress convened, as the gentleman has suggested, the President might have made that suggestion as to consolidations at a little earlier date.

Mr. SNELL. There is not a statement in his message delivered the other day that he did not suggest to your Economy Committee, that he has not made through the press and in his several messages to Congress. He told us four months ago, and he sent at least 20 messages to Congress telling you what he thought we ought to do, and we have not followed him, and he had a right to appeal to the country. And what is disturbing you Democrats is the fact that the people are with the President and condemning the Democratic-controlled House of Representatives. His punch came at just the right time, and, as the New York Times says, "If it is politics, let us have more politics."

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman knows that up until the time the Economy Committee called on the President for his specific suggestions he had never made a specific suggestion to the committee or to Congress.

Mr. SNELL. You tried to call what you thought was the President's bluff, and the President met you at every point; and he went farther than you wanted to go and farther than you could get your own men to follow, and, instead of putting him in the hole, he put your committee in and you did not get out.

Mr. McDUFFIE. And after helping us frame a program, he sent his private secretary, or one of them, up here to help break it down. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Now, let me tell you about that. The gentleman knows the Army and Navy proposition was not the President's program. The President told you when you were down there that he was opposed to it. He has always been opposed to it, and, as far as I know, Mr. Newton did not do anything to break it down, as it was not necessary. This House is for adequate national defense.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Now, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SNELL. Certainly.

Mr. McDUFFIE. As a matter of fact, all of the President's suggestions were not agreed to by every member of the committee, for that matter.

Mr. SNELL. That is true, and the President did not find fault with you because you did not do it.

Mr. McDUFFIE. This committee did not seek to make this proposition a partisan matter. We recognized this was no time for playing politics, such as the President evidently is trying to do with his belated message. We tried to cooperate with the President and we presented a nonpartisan bill.

Mr. SNELL. Well, I do not yield to the gentleman for a speech, but want to say again that there were more votes in the Committee of the Whole to support his bill than on his own side.

Mr. McDUFFIE. And we had a right to expect support on the part of the President and the gentleman's party.

Mr. SNELL. The President did not make any partisan suggestions in his recommendation. The President sat down with you gentlemen and went over it, item by item, and when you did not agree with him he did not find any fault with you because you did not. The only question that the President is finding fault with Congress about is that it did not establish some program. He does not care whether it was his program or yours, but the Congress did not deal any more carefully with your program than it did with the tax legislation proposed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]. The only thing the President says is that we have not performed our duty, and I say on my responsibility as a Member of this House that I am not satisfied with the way Congress has performed its duty so far, and I have as much respect for this body as any man living. But, as a matter of fact, in the consideration of the tax bill, in the consideration of the economy bill, which to a certain extent the majority are more responsible for than the minority, your majority did not do a very good piece of work, and this country knows it.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. LOZIER. The President was Secretary of Commerce for eight years and he has been President for three years. That has given him an opportunity to familiarize himself with duplications and overlappings in the bureaus. Now, the question is, Has the President suggested to Congress or to the American people a single board, bureau, or commission that could be eliminated, or a single activity the expense of which could be reduced.

Mr. SNELL. Yes. That is right there in the message which the gentleman has been criticizing so much. [Applause.] The President asked this Congress over two months ago to give him the authority and he would do it, but the Democratic side of the House refused to give him that authority.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman has not read the bill. We have given the President almost unlimited authority.

Mr. SNELL. Yes. You have given him unlimited authority nothing. Either Senate or House can veto anything he does at any time in 60 days. That is fine authority.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Does the gentleman want to surrender the constitutional powers of the House?

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York 10 additional minutes.

Mr. SNELL. I do not want to surrender any of our constitutional powers, and it is not necessary to do so, but every man in this House, every man who thinks, knows the only way we will ever do anything to bring about economy in the various departments is to put the responsibility up to some man and tell him to take it and produce economies which the country is asking for, and the President asks for that authority, and the Democratic Members have refused it.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SNELL. Very well. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman knows that yesterday the President suggested that we cut his Budget $361,000,000. Why did not the President reduce that Budget himself? It is his Budget. Why did he not reduce it $360,000,000 himself last December when he brought it up here?

Mr. SNELL. That is a very fair question. That Budget was prepared last summer early, when conditions were not as bad as they are at the present time, and no one knew how much income taxes were going to fall off.

Mr. BLANTON. Why, they were just as bad.

Mr. SNELL. No; they were not just as bad.

Mr. BLANTON. There were nearly 7,000,000 men out of employment.

Mr. SNELL. No; there were not, and no one claimed there were. The same conditions did not confront Congress. Furthermore, no one knew what the income of the Government would be at the time the original Budget was prepared.

Now, the President has been absolutely fair about that. I do not want to misquote the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], but if I remember correctly, the gentleman from Tennessee told me early in this session that he had been down and talked with the President of the United States, and the President said, "I will cooperate with you in any reductions you can make, even farther than the Budget has gone, in regard to governmental expenditures."

Now, what could be fairer than that? That came from your own chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for one further question?

Mr. SNELL. Surely.

Mr. BLANTON. The President waited until the Appropriations Committee, headed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], had reduced the supply bills $161,000,000 before he ever came and asked us to reduce them.

Mr. SNELL. Now, as a matter of fact, you have not reduced them $161,000,000.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman should consult Chairman BYRNS's facts in yesterday's RECORD.

Mr. SNELL. That does not make any difference about yesterday's RECORD. That was in part a paper reduction and not an actual reduction. Everyone knows that part of that reduction will have to be made up in deficiency bills. And certainly no one knows that better than the man who made the statement, the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BLANTON. I doubt whether we will ever appropriate any additional sums to meet them.

Mr. SNELL. I do not know anything about that, but I do know the Federal Government is still good for its obligations, and when it makes a contract for $70,000,000 or $80,000,000 it will meet it, and you will have to appropriate the money.

Mr. BLANTON. But the money is not ever paid out until the Appropriations Committee makes the appropriation.

Mr. SNELL. You have not saved anything, and the gentleman knows it; and the best part of it is everyone else knows it.

Mr. MOUSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. MOUSER. We passed a bill involving $132,000,000 for road building in addition to the $75,000,000 heretofore provided, which wiped out practically all of the reductions which were made below the Budget estimates.

Mr. SNELL. It wiped out even the paper reduction, and was put through largely by Democratic votes.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. I would like to ask whether a budget has reference to purely current expense or whether it includes capital investment?

Mr. SNELL. I suppose it includes all.

Mr. KELLER. In other words, the gentleman contends that road building is a part of the Budget?

Mr. SNELL. Surely.

Mr. KELLER. It certainly is not, because a budget has only to do with current expense.

Mr. SNELL. Then I do not agree with the gentleman at all, and we can not get on common ground with respect to that.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am interested in knowing what my friend from Illinois means by capital investment on the part of the Federal Government. I suppose he means something like Muscle Shoals.

Mr. KELLER. If the gentleman will permit, I will answer that.

Mr. SNELL. I can not yield to the gentleman to make a speech. I can not yield any farther, and I think I have been quite generous in yielding. Some gentlemen seem to be a little disturbed about how the country feels in regard to Democratic actions in Congress so far, the Democratic-controlled House of Representatives. I have a long list of statements made by various newspapers throughout the country. I will not quote anything from a Republican newspaper; I will just quote from Democratic newspapers. I suppose they are honest and represent the sentiment of the communities in which they are published.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman yield before he goes to that?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. COLTON. Some of us who listened to the very able and distinguished gentleman from Alabama over the radio the other night have a feeling that he criticized the Congress about as strongly as the President has. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. As I hastily looked over that speech in the RECORD, the speech of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MCDUFFIE], I came to the conclusion that he criticized Congress more severely than the President did, and I think he had reason to do it. [Applause.] Nobody on the Democratic side has risen as yet to condemn the gentleman from Alabama for the statements he made.

Mr. McDUFFIE. It depends on what sort of glasses you were using when you read my speech.

Mr. SNELL. I was using my regular ones.

Mr. McDUFFIE. They were very good from a partisan standpoint.

Mr. SNELL. I am a partisan, but my glasses are regular.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. Does the gentleman think the editorial read by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] represents the sentiment of the people of New York?

Mr. SNELL. I did not hear it.

Mr. CONNERY. That editorial said Congress was made up of traitors and rascals.

Mr. SNELL. I have never gone that far. I have never made any such statement. Now, listen to what the St. Louis Globe-Democrat has to say. It says:

President perfectly justified.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. Does the gentleman consider the St. Louis Globe-Democrat a Democratic newspaper? It has always been a Republican paper.

Mr. SNELL. It is published in the southwestern part of the country, which is largely Democratic.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Would it not be a good idea to dissolve this Economy Committee and let the regular standing committees of the House get down to earth and perform the duties which they should perform, so that they can bring out intelligent legislation? I know they would be able to do that if some members of the President's Cabinet would come before the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and tell them where in their respective departments these consolidations can be made. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. I took that position about two or three months ago, but the Democratic majority did not agree with me at the time. However, after they had made peace with the chairman of that committee, he went along with them.

Mr. SCHAFER. It is not too late now if the Republican membership would join in a movement to provide for the abolition of this fake Economy Committee and let the regular standing committees function. If that were done, I know we could get a sufficient number of intelligent Jeffersonian Democrats to join with us and get down to business. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Some of my friends found fault with the paper from which I was going to quote, the St. Louis Globe-Democrat. I will see what they will do with this one. What about the News Press, of Dallas, Tex.? Is that a Republican paper or a Democratic paper?

Mr. BLANTON. It is a Mugwump paper. The Dallas News is the Democratic paper.

Mr. SNELL. It is supporting the distinguished Speaker for President. It is the headquarters of the Garner-for-President Club, so we will see what you have to say about this.

Mr. BLANTON. It is not a Democratic paper at all.

Mr. SNELL. This paper says:

With infinite patience Mr. Hoover explains once more that this can not be done by merely taxing anew what may turn out to be mythical incomes, corporate and individual, and hypothetical production. Present expense must be reduced and no new expense beyond unavoidable necessity added.

The President had nothing new to tell the Congress on means of saving. This message becomes in effect a recapitulation of the sins of the House of Representatives in leaving undone the things which it ought to have done and in doing the things which it ought not to have done.

This comes from the headquarters town of the Garner-for-President Club.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Not now.

Mr. BLANTON. That is not a Democratic paper. I want the gentleman to name some Democratic paper.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield? I know the gentleman wants to have the RECORD correct.

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. DYER. The St. Louis Globe-Democrat is not a Democratic paper; neither is it a Republican paper. It is an independent paper, in the interest of the whole country, and all the people.

Mr. SNELL. I thank the gentleman for the information, and that is the reason it is supporting the President.

What about the paper in Charleston, S. C.? Is there any Republican paper down there? Does anyone deny that it is Democratic.

Mr. PARKS. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman has asked a question.

Mr. SNELL. Yes; if I have asked a question.

Mr. PARKS. Will not the gentleman join with us in electing Speaker GARNER President of the United States? Does not the gentleman think that would be quite an improvement? [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Of course, I might be a candidate against him myself. So I do not want to foreclose all chances.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for just one question?

Mr. SNELL. I must decline to yield. I have been very generous——

Mr. McDUFFIE. Indeed, the gentleman has.

Mr. SNELL. And I want to tell you what some of the Democratic papers have said. This is your Charleston, S. C., paper:

The President has proposed reduction in governmental expenses of $369,000,000, which, he says, can be increased to $700,000,000. The House of Representatives has "ripped to shreds" the bill presented by its own Economy Committee and reduced its proposed savings from $200,000,000 to $38,000,000.

Never mind the details. The fact is that the House fails to face the country's emergency and adopt measures to balance the Budget and that "fear and alarm prevail in the country because of events in Washington." If the House referred the problem to the President, he would balance the Budget. In the right or the wrong way he would balance it.

The responsibility is on the Congress and first on the Democratic House. It is heeding organized minorities, its Members are working to make good with the boys in their respective bailiwicks. It won't listen to Hoover and it won't listen to itself.

[Laughter and applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from New York five more minutes.

Mr. SNELL. What has anybody got to say about the Baltimore Sun? Has that paper ever said anything in favor of the Republican Party?

Congress deserves what it has been given. It asked for all that it has been given. No need here to state the specifications of its destructive work. That is done admirably in Mr. Hoover's message. And all intelligent people are aware of the details.

It is enough to say to Congress that informed voters know that the indictment is true. It is enough to say that Mr. Hoover, with all of his vacillations of the past, all of his feverish spending, all of his dodging of new taxes, all of his borrowing, is entitled to say that in the record of the past month he stands forth as a figure of consistency and stability in contrast with a Congress destitute of purpose and of will.

This is what it says about your Democratic Congress here.

Here is a paper down in New Orleans. Is that Mugwump, too?

Mr. BLANTON. Partly; yes.

Mr. SNELL. This is headed "Voices 'Desire of the Majority'":

In appealing to Congress for prompt enactment of a Budget-balancing revenue bill plus many of the Federal retrenchment measures junked by the House, President Hoover voices the desire of the American majority, whose confidence in Congress has been visibly shaken by the weird performance of the House.

Now, my friends, if you need any indictment or if it is necessary to indict the Democratic Party for their activities in the House during the present session of Congress, this has been done by your own papers from your own part of the country. [Applause.] I have several more here, but will not take time to read them, for they are all the same. Your own papers condemn you.

Now, as a matter of fact, I am not particular how this economy comes about. It does not make any special difference to me what special program is adopted, but I feel there is an important obligation on this Congress at the present time to get together and to do something definite and to act in accord with the will of the people. [Applause.]

The people of this country at the present time are looking here for stability, they are looking for careful, considerate attention to the needs of the Nation, and they believe we should reduce Government expenses and that we should do it at once. If I understand the position of the President of the United States, it is that he is not particular what program you adopt as long as you adopt some program that will promote stability and confidence in the Congress of the United States, and I approve his position entirely in making that statement. [Applause.]

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I was on the train Friday morning in the dining car of the B. & O. when I first read the President's message. I must have betrayed my feelings, because the courteous porter came up to me and said, "What is the matter, sir; are your eggs bad?" I said, "No; but there is something around here of extremely bad taste."

When the distinguished gentleman from New York, the Republican floor leader—and he is the leader—took the floor I thought he would come to the defense of the men of his party who stood by him and who are now the subject of an unjustified attack upon the part of the President of the United States.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Anyone who has stood by me in connection with these measures needs no defense whatever at this time.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We will see about that. We will come to just that real soon.

The gentleman from New York suggests that we itemize and particularize the parts of the President's message that are not justified or where he made any incorrect statement, and I shall proceed to do that.

I do not know who advised the President of the United States, who furnished him with the facts and figures; but whoever did was not well informed, and I believe put the President in a most embarrassing position.

I agree entirely with the position taken by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] that ours is a representative Government, and that after all the people in this country are represented in this House; that every Member of this House is in touch with the wishes and conditions of the people, and represents them. This is their Government. I challenge my colleague from New York [Mr. SNELL], who states that a majority of the American people are in favor of the misinformation and propaganda that comes from the New York Stock Exchange—to indicate where Congress has failed to act for the best interest of the American people.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield? Have I mentioned the New York Stock Exchange?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; but I have. I will say that the information contained in the President's message is not only in spirit but in many instances similar to the language of statements which appeared in the public press on Sunday by prominent stock brokers of New York, and I will refer to that in a minute. [Applause.]

First of all, let us take the President's message categorically. He says:

> The most essential factor to economic recovery to-day is the restoration of confidence. In spite of the unquestioned beneficial effects of the remedial measures already taken and the gradual improvement in fundamental conditions, fear and alarm prevail in the country because of events in Washington which have greatly disturbed the public mind.

Congress has made every effort to cooperate. Did it not immediately ratify the moratorium? Did it not instantly pass the Reconstruction Finance Corporation? Did it not immediately appropriate $100,000,000 additional to take care of farm loan bank bonds? Did it not immediately pass the Glass-Steagall inflation bill, to which I will refer later? Not a word of this in the President's message when he talks about cooperation. Does the President not know that the culprits who have swindled the American people in selling them worthless South American and foreign securities are now seeking to hide their shame by blaming Congress for a tax bill and talking about balancing the Budget? The real condition should have been exposed instead of blaming Congress. If the President would cooperate with Congress as Congress is cooperating with the President it would be conducive to restoring confidence. But the lack of confidence is not in Congress. The lack of confidence is in the people who control money, in the banks that have failed, in the underwriters who have handed out worthless securities, in the stock brokers who have inflated and rigged the stock market—there is where confidence is lacking. The President should not give comfort to these very people who are now attacking Congress.

I say it is not conducive to confidence when the President of the United States seeks to arraign the American public against its own Congress. [Applause.]

Then he says:

> The manner in which the House of Representatives rejected both the revenue program proposed by the Treasury and the program unanimously reported by the Committee on Ways and Means; the character of the tax measures passed; the action of the House which would increase governmental expenditures by $132,000,000 for road building * * * have all resulted in diminishing public confidence.

Let us take that up seriatim. First, his own Secretary of the Treasury, Ogden Mills, stated on December 14, 1931, that the administration had rejected the sales tax. That is a matter of record. It appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD December 15.

And we put it in during the discussion of the tax bill again. To be specific, this is what Mr. Mills said on December 14, 1931, on the sales tax:

> In the development of a program we considered many forms of taxation. We weighed, for instance, the merits of the general sales or turnover tax, but rejected it, not only because it bears no relation to ability to pay and is regressive in character, but because of the enormous administrative difficulties and the almost inevitable pyramiding of the tax in the course of successive sales. * * * The tax is unquestionably passed on, and adds therefore to the cost of living.

How can the President criticize Congress when his own Secretary of the Treasury publicly stated that the administration had rejected the sales tax? [Applause.]

Now, to the President's next point. He refers to the additional appropriations, $132,000,000 for roads passed by the House. His reference to this additional cost is correct with his statement of diminishing public confidence. The idea for roads as a means of furnishing employment as a relief measure first came from the President of the United States. He said in his message of December 3, 1929 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 24 of that date):

> Federal aid in the construction of the highway system in conjunction with the States has proved to be beneficial and stimulating. We must ultimately give consideration to the increase of our contributions to these systems, particularly with a view to stimulating of farm to market roads.

The idea of increased appropriations for public works in this period of depression has not only been sponsored by the best minds in the country but has been approved—has been universally approved. The President himself was one of the first to recommend it. He has repeatedly urged the additional appropriations for public works, and during 1930 and 1931, and up to the time of the revenue bill when the "balance the Budget" slogan was coined to prevent increased taxes, the President had never spoken in opposition to additional appropriations for public works.

The additional appropriations for public roads which he now criticizes were in keeping with his own program to stimulate work and the purchase of material in periods of depression.

The first additional appropriation was in January, 1930, when the Republican Party had control of this House—from a mere glance of the RECORD—and an additional $50,000,000 was brought in under a rule on January 21, 1930. It will be seen that every leader on the Republican side of the House rejoiced in this constructive legislation, and it met the whole-hearted support of the President of the United States.

Again, in a communication by the President of the United States on December 4, 1930, he asked for additional appropriation of $150,000,000 for emergency-construction fund. This is what the President then said:

> In my annual message to the Congress I requested that an appropriation of from $100,000,000 to $150,000,000 be granted for this purpose, and this estimate is in furtherance of that request. As I stated in that message, the application of this money to work already authorized by the Congress not only limits its application to work already directed by Congress but assures its use in directions the economic importance of which has already been determined by Congress. This plan also avoids the long delays incident to selection of new projects by Congress, and the further long delays in technical preparation which new projects would require, both of which would render such action of no purpose in emergency relief of unemployment. (Doc. 655, 71st Cong., 3d sess.)

On March 14, 1932, only a few weeks ago, the President called upon Congress to expedite the appropriation for the river and harbor work of $60,000,000 and making it immediately available. (Doc. No. 272, 72d Cong., 3d sess.)

On February 27, 1931 (Doc. 788, 71st Cong., 3d sess.), the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General submitted their report of the interdepartmental committee relating to public-buildings construction, which called for appropriations of several hundred million dollars; in fact, the detailed statement at the end of the report showed an allotment of $505,000,000, all of which has the approval of the President of the United States.

As late as April 27, 1932, in a memorandum from the Director of the Budget, which was sent to our colleague the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. SWING] and inserted in the RECORD of May 2, 1932, it is pointed out with pride that the expenditures for public works in 1932 are $623,000,000. I point this out to show that these abnormally large appropriations for public works are unusual and are made by Congress with the approval of the President, on his recommendation, to stimulate work and industry during this terrible period of depression.

The additional appropriations authorized by the House for roads, which he singles out in his message, would lead the country to believe that it was a wasteful, unnecessary, extravagant appropriation. That is not so. As a matter of fact it was simply one of the items contained in the general program of public works and related measures for which the President himself shared in the credit with Congress.

This is another instance I point out where the message is misleading and unfair.

This item is intermingled with the criticism of the House in reference to the tax bill. The connection between the two is difficult to explain. Both are misleading. I have already read to the House the statement from the Secretary of the Treasury on the sales tax. The revenue bill as it passed the House was nearer the Treasury recommendations than the bill as it came from the committee. Then why the criticism? Gentlemen, that brings us up to this whole real attack on Congress. Since the defeat of the sales tax there has been an organized attack on Congress, starting with the Du Pont letter, with misrepresentations, figures, and comparisons that are incorrect, to such an extent that a memorandum to which I have referred from the Director of the Budget was put into the RECORD last Monday showing these flagrant discrepancies. This form letter has been copied, sent out throughout the land, post cards have been printed for citizens to sign and send to their Congressmen, all leading up to one thing—the placing of additional taxes on those unable to pay and relieving big business of its share of taxation.

It is a most strange coincidence, all these attacks leading up to the President's message and the lobbying on the Senate side against the tax bill with an artificially stimulated rally of the stock market of yesterday. Now, what happened? After the House passed the revenue bill many stockbrokers whose customers have been victimized hundreds of millions of dollars, yes, billions of dollars, with South American securities, German securities, Kreuger bonds, and even our domestic bonds and stocks, jumped on Congress to becloud the issue and, to repeat a phrase used by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], "drew a most malodorous herring across the trail of their own misconduct by blaming everything on the revenue bill." The revenue bill passed the House on April 1, 1932, and the stock market has been shot to pieces and steadily declining since 1929.

So the criticism of the President toward Congress seems to be in complete harmony with the stock brokers in their assault against Congress on account of the proposed stock-transfer tax. These statements, to which I have referred, were contained in most of the newspapers of last Sunday, May 1, 1932. I read from the quotations contained in the New York Herald Tribune of that day. Here are a few which will give the House an idea of the attacks on Congress by these very men who have cost the American investors billions and billions of dollars. What alibi did they have in 1929? What alibi did they have in 1930? What alibi did they have in 1931? All of this time, when stocks and securities have been going down, many securities have been wiped out entirely because they were peddled wholly on misrepresentation and misinformation, and the investors were swindled out of their money.

Here are some of the statements issued Sunday by members of the New York Stock Exchange in reference to Congress:

[New York Herald Tribune, Sunday, May 1, 1932]

J. R. Williston & Co.: The news coming from Washington during the past three weeks has seemingly destroyed what little confidence investors have left in the security market, and has no doubt been a large factor in the heavy liquidation in the entire list which is taking place daily. With the tax question being pushed to the foreground, and the unsettled conditions abroad much intensified by recent happenings, little may be expected in the way of an improvement in the market until these problems are solved.

John Muir & Co.: The absolute lack of comprehension on the part of certain congressional elements with respect to the needs of the present situation, together with the weakening of many security holdings by recent persistent declines, brought about a resumption of the liquidating movement. Declines were quite general throughout the list, with bids scarce in some instances. Rails, which had been giving a relatively good account of themselves for several days, were among the weakest.

Carreau & Snedeker: It seems incredible that petty politics, personal prejudices, and similar motivations should be placed above duty in the present circumstances. Yet there is no other explanation to us of tactics which, instead of making reconstruction easier, render it infinitely harder if not wholly impossible. Until a definite change sets in, a child could forecast the trend. Matters are bound to become progressively worse. We continue to recommend caution.

Butler, Herrick & Marshall: The outlook for a balanced Budget and Government retrenchment daily becomes more discouraging. The benefits to be derived from the Federal reserve's antideflation campaign have been made infinitely more difficult of accomplishment by the House's mangling of the economy bill and the failure of the Senate to revise the tax measure along fundamentally sound lines. We are convinced that Congress alone is responsible for the majority of the recent losses suffered by business and securities.

W. J. Wollman & Co.: The principal influence of the last week continued to be the lack of any definite progress being made in Washington toward arriving at a tax measure and an economy measure that would assure the balancing of the Budget. It was hoped that the Senate in its consideration of the new revenue bill would avoid many of the unsound provisions adopted by the House, but from current reports it would seem that it too is using the same fallacious reasoning that the House did.

Jackson Bros., Boesel & Co.: Renewal of liquidation, which has hit the security and commodity markets, unquestionably is due partly to fears that recent developments at Washington will delay balancing of the Federal Budget and other measures aimed to improve the Government's credit by reducing expenditures. Another factor making for unsettlement is the reluctance of banks to make use of surplus funds at a time when the Federal reserve system's policy of easing credit through increased buying of Government securities is gaining momentum. This reluctance may be attributed to the indications that the House is likely to upset the administration's economy program, the necessity of absorbing new Treasury financing, and the provision in the Glass bill governing the purchase of investment securities.

E. F. Hutton & Co.: The conditions under which the Interstate Commerce Commission approved granting a loan to the St. Louis-San Francisco Railroad by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation are constructive, in our opinion. It implies that the Interstate Commerce Commission and the officials of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation do not intend to postpone continually the reckoning date for a number of railroads, but are determined to adjust railroad capitalizations to a size that can be reasonably supported without recovery of 1928–29 traffic volumes. If other Government commissions and trade boards would show the same willingness to face inescapable facts, we think recovery would be brought substantially closer.

Hirsch, Lilienthal & Co.: Anxiety continues on the part of investors as to whether or not the Federal Budget finally will be balanced; another upsetting influence is the apparent inability of Congressmen to invoke worth-while Federal economies. Under such circumstances it is foolhardy to recommend commitments.

Now, just what happened in the last few days? Last Sunday a number of brokers, all members of the stock exchange, sent out statements blaming Congress for the decline in stocks, and referring to the tax bill at the other end of the Capitol. Now, get this: This was on Sunday. On Thursday following the President's message came. Yesterday the Secretary of the Treasury appeared before the Finance Committee of the Senate, and the word went to the stock exchange, "We have balanced the Budget." Do you know what they did? They reduced the surtax on incomes over $2,000,000 and added a tax on 10-cent admission to movies. That is what this false propaganda and vicious lobby succeeded in doing yesterday. Then the word went out to the stock-ticker boys, "Everything is all right; the President scolded Congress, the Senate has knocked out the stock-transfer tax." It was proclaimed that the Budget had been balanced, although the Senate tax bill is $230,000,000 less than ours. But that is not all about this stock game, and it is nothing but a stock-exchange scheme. Get these three things: The appeal sent out by the stock brokers, the President's message on Thursday, the Secretary of the Treasury appearing before the Senate committee Friday. What happened yesterday? Bad news or good news, the gamblers make money. Now I read from this morning's Washington Post:

STOCKS STAGE ROUSING RALLY ON TAXES AND BONUS NEWS—GAINS OF $3 TO $5 PER SHARE RECORDED, WHILE BOND AND CURB MARKET JOIN GENERAL ADVANCE

NEW YORK, May 6.—A rousing rally in the stock market to-day greeted a batch of encouraging news items from Washington.

This again is misleading. It is deliberately misleading the American public. It served the purpose first of selling more stocks, of creating the impression that the President's message rallied the market, it misrepresented the fact that the Senate committee's tax bill eliminating the stock-transfer tax was the cause, all of which did not have the direct effect of raising the market at all. What happened? The New York Times of this morning tells the true story. Now I read from the New York Times:

STEEL PAY CUT AGAIN; STOCKS RISE BRISKLY—15 PER CENT SLASH FOR 200,000 WORKERS A FACTOR IN WIDEST MARKET ADVANCE SINCE FEBRUARY 13—GAINS OF 1 TO 6 POINTS—BETHLEHEM TO MAKE SIMILAR REDUCTIONS—ENTIRE INDUSTRY EXPECTED TO ADJUST WAGES

The wages and salaries of more than 200,000 employees of the United States Steel Corporation will be reduced by approximately 15 per cent on May 15, it was announced yesterday. It was the second cut announced in less than a year, a 10 per cent reduction in wages having been placed in effect last October 1, while the pay of salaried workers had been decreased the same amount on August 1.

I need not read further. It will be seen that the stock-ticker manipulators must have so arranged with the United States Steel Corporation as to synchronize their announcement of a 15 per cent wage reduction with the President's message. That was the cause of a rally in Steel stocks, followed by a statement that Bethlehem would follow, and as Steel and Bethlehem are leading stocks others followed with a raise of from 1 to 6 points. What glory, what satisfaction can any real, true American take from an announcement that stocks have gone up on the strength of a 15 per cent reduction in the pay of 200,000 workers laboring in foundries and furnaces in the steel plants of the country? It is another proof that salary reduction of the Federal employees has been urged by these big interests; it is another proof that the working people and the wage earners are expected to pay the whole cost of this depression.

Now, I will say that it makes no difference how much these stocks rallied yesterday, it did not put a single solitary man to work, and this is the proof absolute of this program to bleed the weak. That is all there is to it. They said that Congress went out to soak the rich. Here is a definite, complete program synchronized in its efforts to bleed the weak and take it out of the working people of this country. [Applause.]

Some one suggested a bill of particulars. I am giving one. Here is the next point in the President's message. He refers to the veterans' bill. Let us be fair. Was it fair of the President of the United States to make that reference to the widows' pension bill, when in his statement in opposition to the bonus, and in his annual message and in public statements he has repeatedly stated that it is the solemn obligation of the American people to take care of its disabled veterans, their widows, and dependents? The President of the United States should have known from his advisers the parliamentary situation which brought that bill before the House. I submit it was manifestly unfair for the President of the United States to proclaim to the people of the country that he was in favor of proper relief and proper care for veterans of our wars, and after that was passed, and he knew the bonus was killed, to make any such reference to the widows and orphans bill in his message to Congress.

Then the gentleman refers to the Goldsborough bill. I am sorry the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] is not here now. The President in his message said:

The passage of legislation by the House placing a burden of impossible execution upon the Federal reserve system over the protest of the Federal Reserve Board—

I submit to the gentleman from New York who asked if there was any mistake or incorrect statement made, that there is an unpardonable misstatement of facts. What is the situation? Gentlemen will remember the Glass-Steagall bill which we passed. Was not that an inflation bill? Did it not have the backing and support of the administration; did it not have the support of the Federal Reserve Board? Were we not told, "If Congress does not pass that bill within a few hours a catastrophe will happen," and did we not pass it? Is not that the truth? What does the Goldsborough bill do? It does nothing except to declare in legislative enactment the policy of the United States Government as to the value of currency, the same principle contained in the Glass-Steagall bill.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. Does it not go a lot farther and direct the board to peg the price? I voted for the bill, but let us be fair about it. All the President says is that which I think the gentleman believes—a thing that the board can not possibly do.

Mr. BLANTON. Then why did the gentleman vote for it?

Mr. MICHENER. He relied entirely upon the committee, because no one knew anything about it until it was brought up here in the House.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The gentleman did not know anything about it, but that does not mean that nobody else did.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Let us take the explanation offered by the leaders' first lieutenant, the gentleman from Michigan, and see what it does. The Glass-Steagall bill permits inflation to the extent of the satisfaction of the bankers. The Federal Reserve Board is at this very moment inflating currency. This was frankly stated to the Committee on Banking and Currency by George L. Harrison, governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York City. He testified that the Federal reserve banks were purchasing Government securities at the rate of $25,000,000 a week, and had been so doing on April 13, 1932, for the past seven weeks, and I have it on pretty good information that the President himself, believing that this amount was too small, had the Federal Reserve Board increase it in one week to $100,000,000. In the face of that, how can any criticism be properly leveled at the House in passing the Goldsborough bill?

The Goldsborough bill carries out that policy so that it will be beneficial to the farmers who are in debt several billion dollars. [Applause.] It fixes commodity prices. In other words, it makes gold subordinate to the necessaries of life, instead of making gold absolute master of our economics in this country. Prof. Irving Fisher succinctly states the intent of the bill in one short paragraph:

It is the fallacious and common opinion of the average man, until he is waked up by studying the subject enough to realize that the only real stability is stability of purchasing power, that what you really want is a commodity dollar, that what you really want is a market-basket dollar, a stability in purchasing power of our commodities in general, not of one commodity only, gold. In other words, what you want is a stable price level.

The President knew about it. It was before the Banking and Currency Committee for several weeks. The committee held hearings on nine days. It was discussed on the floor of this House.

The President of the United States and the distinguished Republican floor leader in this House are under no political obligation to me. I do not need their defense, but I say it was most ungracious, most unkind, to condemn two such loyal party men, two men who are so devoted to the administration, two such personal friends of the President himself as the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] and the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], both members of the Banking and Currency Committee, who came here on the floor of the House after years of study on the subject and approved and supported the bill and asked our votes for it. [Applause.] Both of these gentlemen have at the risk of great political sacrifice defended the administration time after time, and the reference of the President to that bill was most unkind, to put it mildly, to these gentlemen and the majority of his own party who voted for it. I resent any insinuation that the House of Representatives did not know the contents of a bill as important as that.

Perhaps some individual Members who are sufficiently unashamed to declare their ignorance of legislative matters may not have known the contents, but I say the majority of the Members who voted for that bill knew what was in that bill, knew what it would do, and voted for it because they believed in it. There is no justification for the President's slur on that bill until we have an opportunity to see how it will work out.

No matter what it does, the economic condition of the country can not be in a worse state than it is or was before the bill was ever thought of. [Applause.]

Now we come to another question of fact, which shows the careless use of figures. This is what the President says in his rebuke message to the Congress on economy:

> A drastic program of economy which, including the savings already made in the Executive Budget of $369,000,000, can be increased to exceed $700,000,000 per annum.

Now, get this:

> Considering that the whole Federal expenditure, except about $1,700,000,000, is for uncontrollable obligations, this would represent an unprecedented reduction.

In other words, the President of the United States knows that reductions can be made only from appropriations totaling $1,700,000,000, and he asks this Congress, and he sends word out to the country, to reduce from that amount of $1,700,000,000 over 40 per cent, or $700,000,000, and any legislator with experience knows that that is impossible and can not be done. [Applause.]

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] asks us to point out one specific instance where the President's message is not correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York 10 additional minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I submit the unfairness of the incorrect conclusion that $700,000,000 may be cut from $1,700,000,000.

Now as to the Budget message, the question was raised during the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL]. The President signed his Budget message on December 7, and in that message he knew of the deficit now confronting us. The President in the Budget message said that the deficit for 1931 was over $900,000,000 and that for 1932 it would be well over $2,000,000,000, so that when the President submitted the Budget message he had all the facts. Again I submit that the frantic cry for economy is the result of efforts to bring down tax rates in the pending revenue bill. I am sorry to see the President fall into that trap.

In addition to that, we all know that in the latter part of 1931 there were issued $1,000,000,000 of 24-year bonds. In order to meet the deficit then and in the early part of this year, $900,000,000 additional long-term bonds were issued to meet indebtedness incurred for current expenses and the failure of our foreign debtors to make their regular annual payment.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield for a brief statement?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. Within the last three months five members of the President's Cabinet appeared before the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, before the Economy Committee was created, and the members of the Expenditures Committee asked where savings could be made, and not one of them could indicate a saving of one-half of 1 per cent of what the administration now claims can be saved, according to press releases. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Now, in keeping with that, let me say, what does the President ask us to do? To give him power to "combine munition manufacture, the Army and Navy hospitals, and aviation fields, and other specific Army and Navy activities."

Now, pardon a personal reference, but in my humble way and in my ineffective efforts in sustaining the Economy Committee's program for consolidating the national defense, I pointed out that there would be savings in munitions; that there would be savings in ordnance; that there would be savings in hospitals; and that there would be savings in aviation. Did I not do that? It will be found at page 9333 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. BLANTON. And the President now agrees with the gentleman?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; but the point I make that he criticizes Congress for failing to act on these particular consolidations, when it is and was no secret that the President and administration officials were opposing the Army and Navy consolidation. This is another instance where the message is incorrect. And that brings us to another point.

To-day the President in his statement to the public refers "to a swarm of lobbyists like locusts who haunt the Halls of Congress." The lobbies of the House Office Building and this Capitol were never so crowded with admirals and generals who appeared here in opposition to the consolidation of the Army and Navy. [Applause.] I submit to the President, if he wishes to stop lobbying, here is one group of minorities that he can immediately stop. As Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, he needs no legislation to stop this class. He can issue an order and tell his admirals and generals and his military and naval lobbyists to keep away from the Congress and let us legislate. [Applause.]

And, talking about lobbyists, my friends, do you remember during the discussions on the tax bill, when we placed a tax on stock transfers, the pressure that was brought to bear on us? Do you remember the abuse that we got because we opposed the sales tax? Is it not an unfortunate synchronization when, on the next day after the President makes his appeal to keep lobbyists away from Washington, the lobbyists of the special interests had already done their dirty work in emasculating the tax on the other side of the Capitol? [Applause.]

Now, as to the reference in the message to the Special Economy Committee's bill. The main difference there was on the reduction of wages. It would appear that no wages were reduced. Is there one word in the message that shows that all salaries over $2,500 are reduced by 11 per cent? In a word, the country would be led to believe by this message that Congress refused to reduce salaries. Is that not misleading? Is it not true that 70 per cent of the employees of the Federal Government are drawing less than $2,500? That being so, in accordance with the figures and taking living conditions into consideration and the additional fact that industry and commerce throughout the country have repeatedly stated, and in many instances already informed their employees, that salaries and wages would be reduced as soon as the Government did so, and this in many instances would mean an additional reduction of wages. Congress was justified, the House was justified, and the votes on both sides of the aisles show the majority of the House knew what they were doing when they exempted $2,500 from the salary reductions.

Is there anyone that is so heartless as to regret that the $1,100, the $1,200, the $1,300 employees have not had their pay reduced? The mere fact that 70 per cent of the employees of the Federal Government are under the $2,500 class, and that the average pay of all Government employees is $1,440, is another evidence of the desire to make the underpaid, the small-salaried, the low-waged workers pay the cost of this depression, and in this instance contribute more than their share to the deficit in the Treasury.

The House by its vote reduced the pay over $2,500 of every Government employee 11 per cent, and in addition to that abolished extra pay for night work and overtime—a saving to the Government and a direct loss to thousands of loyal Government employees of over $20,000,000.

Now, just a word as to lack of cooperation. The charge may very well be reversed. It is no secret, and I am sure the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] will bear me out when I say that many Members of this House made frantic efforts to bring about a compromise acceptable to the President and his administration and to organized labor. I personally appealed to two members of the President's Cabinet and to the Director of the Budget, and repeatedly offered my good offices in bringing the representatives of American labor and administration together on this subject of economy and salary reduction.

My offer was well received at first, but then in the hope of being able to slash salaries, regardless of merit, in the hope of reducing the low, underpaid employee, in the hope of being able to put through a so-called "staggering" plan that would have taken $88,000,000 from the pockets of the employees of the United States Government, all efforts of conciliation, all attempts of bringing about a compromise were spurned.

Gentlemen, I will state that up to 2 o'clock of last Saturday, April 30, the day we voted on the bill, I still held out an offer of compromise to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] and other Members that I know. The gentleman from California [Mr. WELCH], the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LANKFORD], the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] were exerting every effort to bring about a satisfactory settlement, and every effort was refused, rejected, and spurned.

It can not be said in this instance that hindsight is better than foresight, because I and many of my colleagues did have the foresight to attempt to bring about an acceptable adjustment. The 5-day plan was acceptable. It was not fair to make the employee pay the entire cost. The compromise suggested was along the lines of the Cochran amendment. Naturally, labor conditions which have taken labor 50 years to obtain should not have been summarily eliminated.

A 5-day week, with Government taking half the cost and employees taking half the cost, would have been satisfactory to organized labor, and it would have made a saving of $44,000,000 to the Government. Who was the President of the United States consulting with then? Is it right to take the House to task, criticize it, abuse it before the whole country when his administration and spokesmen refused to confer, refused to conciliate, refused to consider this matter in a constructive, fair, and equitable manner?

It may be asked, why organized labor?

The American Federation of Labor represents labor in this country.

As I have stated so many times on the floor of the House, labor and the wage earners throughout the country are interested in this reduction. The reason is that it does not affect the Government employees alone—the workers in the navy yard, the technicians, skilled and unskilled wage earners—but it affects wage earners and the salaries throughout the whole land.

Labor had a right to be heard, and this time it was not. Therefore I submit that this is another instance where the message is incomplete.

High wages! Stabilized industry and stabilized wages! Where did we get our cue? Where did we get our inspiration for the necessity of maintaining high wages in order to maintain the purchasing power of the country? From the President himself. Now, please listen to this. On November 21, 1929, in a White House announcement, this statement went to the country:

The White House announcement, in full text, follows:

"The President was authorized by the employers who were present at the morning's conference to state on their individual belief that they will not initiate any movement for wage reductions, and it was their strong recommendation that this attitude should be pursued by the country as a whole. They considered that aside from the human considerations involved, the consuming power of the country will thereby be maintained.

"The President was also authorized by the representatives of labor to state that in their individual views and as their strong recommendation to the country as a whole no movement beyond those already in negotiation should be initiated for increase of wages, and that every cooperation should be given by labor to industry and the handling of its problems.

"The purpose of these declarations is to give assurance that conflicts should not occur during the present situation which will affect the continuity of work, and thus to maintain stability of employment." (United States Daily, November 22, 1929, p. 3.)

President Hoover on December 23 announced that the policy of the Federal Government in connection with the payment of wages on Government contracts will be to insist that contractors for Government work shall pay the prevailing wages in their respective communities.

President Hoover, in commenting upon the subject, said that at the time of the business depression a year ago and as a result of the White House conferences that followed with business and industrial leaders an understanding was reached whereby the leading employers would maintain the existing wage scales. That action, the President said, has been one of the most constructive contributions made during the business depression.

The example set by the business and industrial leaders was followed by the Government in the maintenance of wage scales, the President added, with one or two minor exceptions, which have since been corrected. (United States Daily, December 24, 1930, p. 1.)

[Extract from address of President Hoover before the American Federation of Labor, Boston, Mass.]

* * * at the White House last November for mitigation of the effects of the present depression.

* * * the leaders of business and industry undertook to do their utmost to maintain the rate of wages. They also undertook in case of shortened employment to distribute work as evenly as possible over their regular body of employees. The leaders of labor undertook to urge effort in production and to prevent conflict and dispute. The public officials and the managers of industries and utilities undertook to expand construction work to mitigate unemployment.

We have now had nearly a year in which to observe the working of these arrangements. These, the first undertakings of this character in our history, have been carried out in astonishing degree. There are, of course, exceptions; but in the large sense our great manufacturing companies, the railways, utilities, and business houses have been able to maintain the established wages. Employers have spread their employment systematically. For the first time in more than a century of these recurring depressions we have been practically free of bitter industrial conflict. (United States Daily, October 7, 1930, p. 2407 (yearly index).)

President Hoover was described at the White House April 2 as being highly gratified that the Nation's principal industries have been successful during the period of the economic depression in keeping up existing wage scales.

This statement, in effect, was made on behalf of President Hoover when his attention was called on April 2 to published statements that he was understood to be apprehensive over the apparent determination of some industries to force the wage level down. The administration, it was explained, has constantly advocated the maintenance of existing wage scales. The President was said to feel that the leading industries have stood by in maintaining these wage scales.

As a result of conferences President Hoover had with representative business men there have been no strikes, no general wage reduction, and no social disorders, it was said. The period of the business depression has been unique in this matter, it was added. (United States Daily, April 3, 1931, p. 1.)

WHITE HOUSE STATEMENT

No member of the administration has expressed the view or holds the view that the policy of the administration in advocating maintenance of wages should be changed. It has not been changed. (United States Daily, July 29, 1931, p. 1.)

Despite announcements of wage cuts in the steel and other industries, President Hoover's anxiety to maintain American standards of living is unaltered and has been consistent, it was stated on his behalf September 23 at the White House. The White House declined to amplify this statement. (United States Daily, September 24, 1931, p. 1.)

That is on wages. Let me tell you something about confidence. The President of the United States appeals to Congress as to the necessity of maintaining confidence. The American people know whom they can rely upon when it comes to appeals for confidence. Let us go back two years. Listen to this. On October 25, 1929, President Hoover said:

The fundamental business of the country—that is, production and distribution of commodities—is on a sound and prosperous basis.

On November 22, 1929, Alexander Legge, chairman of the Federal Farm Board, said:

It looks as if industry would have to begin scraping around to get employees instead of laying off anybody.

In November, 1929, President Hoover said:

Any lack of confidence in the economic future or the basic strength of business in the United States is foolish.

On January 21, 1930, a press dispatch said:

Definite signs that business and industry have turned the corner from the temporary period of emergency that followed deflation of the speculative market were seen to-day by President Hoover. The President said the reports to the Cabinet showed that the tide of employment had changed in the right direction.

On May 1, 1930, President Hoover said:

While the crash only took place six months ago, I am convinced that we have now passed the worst, and with continued unity of effort we shall rapidly recover. There is one certainty of the future of a people of the resources, intelligence, and character of the people of the United States—that is, prosperity.

On August 7, 1930, JAMES J. DAVIS, then Secretary of Labor, said:

Courage and resource are already swinging us back on the road to recovery. And we are fortunate in having a President who sets us a shining example of that courage and initiative.

In September, 1928, Andrew W. Mellon said:

There is no cause for worry. The high tide of prosperity will continue.

Go on, you suckers, buy bum stocks and buy worthless bonds. On December 5, 1929, Mr. Mellon said:

The Government's business is in sound condition.

Yet in less than two years we have a deficit of $2,150,000,000. Mr. Mellon, on January 1, 1930, said:

I see nothing, however, in the present situation that is either menacing or warrants pessimism. During the winter months there may be some slackness or unemployment, but hardly more than at this season each year. I have every confidence that there will be a revival of activity in the spring, and that during the coming year the country will make steady progress.

We have got rid of him, and yesterday he pulled the same thing in England. [Applause.] Robert P. Lamont, Secretary of Commerce, on March 3, 1930, said:

As weather conditions moderate we are likely to find the country, as a whole, enjoying its wonted state of prosperity. Business will be normal in two months.

Mr. Lamont, on September 22, 1930, said:

It is perfectly clear that business, on the whole, has ceased the marked decline which was characteristic of a number of earlier months, and there are some distinctly encouraging features.

Mr. Lamont, on December 6, 1930, said:

We have already weathered the worst of the storm, and signs of stability and recovery are already appearing.

Now, get this. SIMEON D. FESS, chairman of the Republican National Committee, made a statement, and if there ever was a time that I agreed with Senator FESS it was this time. Oh, listen to this boy:

Persons high in Republican circles are beginning to believe that there is some concerted effort on foot to utilize the stock market as a method of discrediting the administration. Every time an administration official gives out an optimistic statement about business conditions, the market immediately drops.

Gentlemen, I say that statement is true, and if President Hoover would have taken the stand which President Wilson did when he stated to the country in 1912—I have referred to it several times—when he heard that certain people were threatening a panic unless certain legislation was enacted, "If anyone dares to do it, I will hang him higher than Haman." [Applause.]

If President Hoover had taken the admonition of Mr. FESS and followed through, the people of this country might have been saved several billion dollars. If the President had followed Mr. Wilson's lead and fought these fellows back instead of surrendering to them he would have had all of Congress and all of the American people back of him in that fight. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, after all, what is this all about? Is it not only a certain few privileged bankers and a few brazen stockbrokers who have caused our present misery? Did they not attempt to write the revenue bill so that $660,000,000 would be placed on the backs of the working and unemployed people of this country? When we defeated that they smarted under the lash of defeat, and because we put a tax on stock transfers they started a cruel, cowardly bear market, coupled with the most vicious propaganda that was ever started in any country of the world. The other day, because they succeeded in knocking out the transfer tax, they had this jubilee at the stock exchange, but the tax bill is far from completed.

The time has passed when the stock ticker is any indication of the soundness or the prosperity of this country. [Applause.] We can only measure the prosperity of this country by the number of men we are employing who are able to maintain happy American homes. I appeal to my colleagues, let us not lose courage because some sinister person with selfish interests has misrepresented the facts to the President of the United States and he in turn has sent this ill-advised message. Let us proceed on our way. Let us strive to legislate for the welfare of the great masses of the American people.

Our country is in a bad and in a critical economic condition. We can not save it by helping the stockbrokers, we can not save it by helping the very men who defrauded the investors of this country of billions and billions of dollars, but we can help it by legislating to stimulate and to create employment for the millions of men who are now unemployed and by keeping up the American standard of wages and the American standard of living. [Applause.]

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BALDRIGE].

Mr. BALDRIGE. Mr. Chairman, we have been having a sort of cat-and-dog fight for the last day and a half. I believe that most of the spellbinders have had their say. I feel there is important legislation before us, and as I understand from both sides of the House, politics is over and we should get down to discussing the bill before us. I believe most of us west of the Hudson are not particularly interested in the stock exchange, but we are very much interested in the Army appropriation bill, which is the matter we started out to discuss yesterday. So I take it, it is not improper for me to leave this political discussion and get down to the pending business, which is the Army appropriation bill.

When I first saw this bill I was surprised and amazed, because in my estimation the Army appropriation bill which has just been reported by the committee emasculates our national defense. I find among other things it takes out 2,000 officers and does away entirely with the citizens' military training camps, and cripples the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and the Officers' Reserve Corps. I would like to speak for 10 minutes in regard to these items, particularly the citizens' military training camps.

Our memory is long enough to recall what happened to our country in 1917 when we entered the war. You can describe in one sentence our national-defense system. The national-defense system of our country is a reasonable amount of military training for our citizens, coupled with an appropriate Regular Army that can expand sufficiently in time of war to become the skeleton of our National Army. Anyone who cripples one part of this system strikes at the very heart of the safety of our country.

The thing that arouses me particularly is doing away with the citizens' military training camps. Will you pardon me for making a special reference to my own experience, but it is the best example I know, and is the reason I feel so strongly about this matter. I was not a Member of the Congress when we declared war. I did spend the two best years of my life in the Army, and I lost a great many of my personal friends in the war. When I see the committee bring out this bill to-day after having had the experience I have had, it burns me up and I can not help but express myself.

When we went to the training camps at first we were a group of young men who had had no experience. There were scattered among us a group of Regular Army sergeants and corporals and officers, enough to whip the organization into shape in two or three months. Following this experience I was a captain in the Field Artillery, located at Camp Dodge. I had 190 men given to me. They were men from off the farms and we did not have one person to help us. I can not describe the difficult time we had with a group like that. Now, in case of a national emergency, if we had to bring such men into action, with such lack of training, it would be disastrous. But with a sprinkling of men with a little citizens' military training it would be vastly different.

The answer to this is the citizens' military training camp. Every year 37,000 of our boys spend one month under Uncle Sam's guidance and under the direction of Regular Army officers, and this outpouring of young men follows along from year to year. After their experience in these camps they become members of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and after that experience they are ready to help out in a time of national emergency.

The citizens' military training camp is the greatest institution in our country to-day. We started out with it in 1922, when we had 12 camps and 10,000 boys.

Last year we had 38,500 boys enter the 53 camps. If we stop the training for one year, our work is absolutely gone. We could never take up the thread again. It is just that important.

I spoke a while ago of losing quite a number of my friends. I know what happened—most of our officers were not trained men.

One young English officer told me that his father and brother were killed alongside of him. He shook his head and said, "That is not what I am complaining about. The thing that hurts me is that they never had a chance; the officers were young men who had only had a training of one month, and they ordered their company up the hillside with no protection right in front of German machine guns. My father and brother might be alive to-day if these officers had had experience."

To you pacifists let me say that our greatest insurance against war is to be able to put on the field quickly a well-trained large citizens' army.

Mrs. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BALDRIGE. I will yield to the lady.

Mrs. ROGERS. I want to state to the gentleman that two years ago one of the finest Members that we had in Congress, a World War officer, who served overseas, told the House of Representatives that one of his young privates came to him just before he went over the top and said, "I do not know how to load a rifle. Will you show me?" This could not have happened if the boy had had citizens' military training camp training.

Mr. BALDRIGE. I thank the lady. That is exactly the point. Now, think of it; here is the one possible chance we have to recruit noncommissioned officers and officers for service in time of national disaster, and yet this committee comes along and in one blow wipes out entirely the military training camps. Gentlemen, I say that is wrong.

Here is a bill carrying millions of dollars. We are all for economy, but let us cut it along the proper lines—if training-camp appropriations have to be cut some, that is all right—I think the Army appropriations ought to have reasonable cuts. I am not asking to spend a large sum on these training camps, but let us have enough so that we can carry on.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BALDRIGE. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Is it not a fact that we are getting along on a small standing Army because of the efficiency of the second and third lines of defense—like the National Guard and the citizens training camps and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps?

Mr. BALDRIGE. Absolutely.

Mr. SNELL. And if you cut off any part of it you disturb the whole system.

Mr. BALDRIGE. That is true. Now, this is a small amount. I know that some amendment will be offered putting back the training camps.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BALDRIGE. I will.

Mr. PETTENGILL. How many were in the training camps last year?

Mr. BALDRIGE. Thirty-eight thousand five hundred.

Mr. PETTENGILL. How many would be affected in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps cut?

Mr. BALDRIGE. I think about 7,200; and in these two groups, totaling 45,700, are many students who will be clamoring for jobs which should go to men with families.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman further yield?

Mr. BALDRIGE. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Is it not a fact that the training camps develop not only the military capacity of the young men but contribute largely to their general health?

Mr. BALDRIGE. Yes; under our Regular Army officers they not only learn military tactics but obedience, loyalty, and efficiency. It is the greatest thing in the world for future citizens. No one can state that we have a large Army. With a population of 122,000,000 we only have 118,000 enlisted men and 12,000 officers, about four-tenths of 1 per cent of our population, while Italy has 14 per cent of her population organized for military service; Switzerland, 15 per cent; and France 14 per cent. Our isolated position does not demand as large a military establishment as these other countries. I live in the Middle West. My part of the country would feel the ravages of an invasion last of all, but I can not stand idle and see our national-defense plan crucified. I want the utmost protection for my wife and family.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BALDRIGE. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. As I understand the attitude of my colleague, he is not in favor of a large standing army, but he feels that the maintenance of these training camps will render unnecessary a large standing army, that we shall always be prepared if we keep up the training-camp service.

Mr. BALDRIGE. Absolutely. That is the life saver for our country, that is the purpose of our national defense act—a large citizen military army trained sufficiently to take the field quickly and efficiently. As in a gang of little boys, the bully never picks on the one who can defend himself. The weak kid gets the trouble.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BALDRIGE. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Does the gentleman know how General Pershing feels with reference to this service?

Mr. BALDRIGE. I know that he is greatly in favor of it. At one time he asked for 500,000 trained officers, and none over 45 years of age.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Our great leader in the war. I was Assistant Chief of Staff and in almost constant contact with him for several years in the War Department. I know that he considers no element of training in this country to-day more important than the training of these young men in the citizens' military training camps, these great camps that saved our organization during the World War, these so-called Wood camps.

Mr. FULLER. And does the gentleman think that we can afford to retain these officers and at the same time carry out the economy program of the President?

Mr. BALDRIGE. I do. It is not economy when you strike at the heart of our Army.

Mr. McCORMACK. I call the attention of my friend to the fact that in every war we have ever been in our history shows that never were we prepared, and the national defense act of 1920 was passed as the result of experience in the World War, having in mind the conditions that confronted us at the time of the declaration of war. That act was passed for the purpose of assuring reasonable preparation in the event of war in the future.

Mr. BALDRIGE. Yes. The proper amendments will be offered to put back the citizens' military training camps, the Officers' Reserve Corps, and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, so that we may carry on. We have to take a cut all along the line, and we expect that; but I ask you gentlemen to give this careful consideration and to save the military training camps, the Officers' Reserve Corps, and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps.

Mrs. ROGERS. And does not the gentleman feel that they are a wonderful influence in creating good citizenship?

Mr. BALDRIGE. Yes.

Mrs. ROGERS. And at the present time, with world-wide unrest and the recent assassination of the President of France, it seems to me that it is important to create the wish to give service. It is important to make good citizens, and nothing does more than citizens' military training camps and Reserve Officers' Training Corps to foster good citizenship.

Mr. BALDRIGE. Of all times for Congress to do away with our national defense, this is the worst time.

Mr. PARKS. The gentleman knows that we are not doing away with the Reserve Officers' Training Corps and, in addition to that, that we only ask that the citizens' training camps subside for a matter of one year.

Mr. BALDRIGE. But if we break the thread of them, we are gone. You are crippling the Reserve Officers' Training Corps and demolishing the citizens' military training camps.

Mr. PARKS. And where would you take the money away from the military department to carry these camps on?

Mr. BALDRIGE. The proper amendments will be offered that will answer the gentleman's question. I have seen them.

Mr. PARKS. On the committee we were endeavoring to find somebody that would give us those proper amendments, but we were not able to find anybody.

Mr. BALDRIGE. I shall be glad to offer them if nobody else will.

Mr. BARBOUR. The amendments will be offered to restore these things. I shall show the gentleman how we can do it when the proper time comes.

Mr. PARKS. I shall be delighted.

Mr. BALDRIGE. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to make another plea for Federal aid for those who are in distress. The time is near at hand when Congress will consider adjourning of the present session. I feel that it would be exceedingly dangerous, as well as inhumane, if we should come to adjournment without having done anything more than merely the vote of wheat for the relief of those who are suffering for the necessaries of life.

Employment conditions have not improved. On the contrary, they are growing worse. The vast army of unemployed remains undiminished. Indeed, it is increasing. The streets of our cities and the highways of our industrial communities are thronged with honest and industrious men who can not find work to do wherewith to support their families. The slender reserves of those out of employment are still further diminished. The funds which communities have been able to make available for relief are now approaching exhaustion. The charity funds in practically all of our industrial communities are about gone. There is scarcely a relief organization in the whole country that has resources that will last beyond the next 30 to 60 days. We are about to come to the 1st of July with the communities exhausted in their resources and with no lessening of the number of those who are in distress.

I received yesterday a report from the relief society of an industrial community in my district which showed that in November of last year there were 163 families that were being supported. That number had increased to 340 families in January; and instead of diminishing with the coming of warmer weather it had in April increased to the appalling total of 747 families.

That marks the progress of the suffering and the exhaustion of private resources and public funds which might be devoted to relief. I feel that Congress can not afford to adjourn without making some provision for the emergency which seems to me to lie just in front of us.

On the 3d of March the House passed a resolution providing for the distribution of 40,000,000 bushels of publicly owned wheat to those who were in need. That measure was subsequently approved by the Senate and signed by the President. Perhaps the money value of that relief did not exceed twelve to fifteen million dollars. It seems quite likely that $15,000,000 in cash could have been expended to such advantage as to have given relief equal to that of the 40,000,000 bushels of wheat.

It was a mere drop in the bucket, and yet it did great good. Men, women, and children are alive in the world to-day who would have been dead from starvation had we not made that contribution. The measure passed the House by a vote of 344 in the affirmative and 2 in the negative. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADKINS] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] were the only two whose votes were recorded against it.

The contribution was small, but in one respect it was highly valuable. The chief value which lay in that measure was in the precedent which was established—the principle which it laid down—the path which it marked out. The significance of it was that it recognized that the National Government had a responsibility in this crisis, and that it was the duty of the Government to come to the aid of those who are suffering. That was the first principle established. The second significance was that the time was ripe when something should be done.

The Congress which passed it and the President who signed it having recognized this principle of national duty, found as a fact that the situation throughout the country required that the Government should extend aid to those who were in distress. By that principle and by that finding of fact every Member of Congress who voted for it and the President of the United States, if they have regard for consistency, are now bound. It is useless to argue longer that there is a Federal duty and that the time has arrived when it should be discharged. Those issues are settled.

I remember that at the beginning of the present session I introduced a bill placing $100,000,000 in the hands of the President for the relief of the starving among our fellow citizens. My bill gave the President the fullest and widest discretion. It authorized him to use any agencies that he might select for the distribution of the fund and authorized him either to distribute it in the form of cash or in commodities, either by way of gifts or by way of loans.

The bill which I introduced was identical in principle with the measure which the House adopted in voting the wheat. I advocated the passage of that measure here, even on the threshold of the present session, with such poor arguments and pleas as I was able to advance. When I had concluded my remarks I found myself charged upon by the three horsemen from New England, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL].

I was even apologized for by some on my own side who feared that I would taint our party with advocacy of the principle of relief through Federal aid for starving Americans. None were there so poor to do me reverence.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] in almost plain terms charged me as a socialist. The gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. LUCE, said that the measure was of communism. Of course, I did not take them to heart, because I knew that neither of them knew socialism or communism from rheumatism or anything else that ended in "ism." [Laughter.] I was also the object of the delicate attentions of the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. UNDERHILL, who said that I had forgotten the principles of Jefferson and a lot more stuff along lines of which he was entirely ignorant. [Laughter.]

A few weeks passed. We took a vote upon the wheat resolution, and when I look at the record of the votes of Members I am amazed to find that "Lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest!" BEEDY, from Maine, on this piece of socialism, "aye." LUCE, from Massachusetts, "aye," for a measure of communism. The gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. UNDERHILL, was either conveniently or inconveniently absent and did not vote at all.

So, Mr. Chairman, let us have done with those subterfuges. Let us have done with pretenses. Let men no longer cloak themselves with high principle to justify denying bread to the starving. Let Mr. LUCE, to whose better and more thoughtful self the wheat resolution was addressed, and who in the latter capacity rendered a wise and humane decision—I call upon him now, in consistency and in line with his vote on March 3, to support a measure which will permit some provision against the ruin and despair and starvation and death which may stalk the streets of our cities and our industrial communities within the next few months. [Applause.]

The Congress can not afford to adjourn and leave the President without means in his hands which, in the exercise of a wise discretion, he may use for such an emergency. In his excoriation of the House in his message of two or three days ago he makes provision for just that situation. He uses the expression, "for undoubted emergency."

The measure which I have proposed is one which can not be objected to except by those who feel that the National Government should not intervene in such a situation no matter how desperate the need. The man who feels that the Government should sit here in Washington and allow citizens throughout the country to starve to death, and has that adherence to high principle, then he can insist upon leaving nothing in the President's hands. But none of those 344 Members, including the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], who voted for the wheat measure, can now consistently take that position.

My measure would place this money in the hands of the President and give him a free hand in its distribution. I am willing to trust him. I am willing to place this money in his hands and allow him to distribute it.

We have had a great deal of talk in opposition to the creation of a Federal bureau to dispense aid to the people Certain gentlemen in another place, which shall be nameless here, have stood upon that high principle and have refused to vote relief to the distressed. Those same gentlemen a few days later voted for this wheat resolution, which turned the matter over to the President, to be distributed through the Red Cross to the distressed people at home, just as they had previously voted to make crop loans through the Department of Agriculture and just as they had previously voted in another session in favor of similar measures. They are willing to have Federal bureaus dispense aid for the building of roads, the raising of animals, and whatever else they might want money for in their States. They are willing to have a Federal bureau make loans to the people. It is only when the time came that starving women and children reached out their hands and begged for bread that they suddenly found a high principle which forbade their going along.

Mr. Chairman, I am not a politician and am in quite indifferent odor here on my own side. So no partisan interpretation can be given to anything I have said or that I am now going to say.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. In his message on the 5th the President said:

> The most essential factor to economic recovery to-day is the restoration of confidence.

There seems to be some confusion of thought in that. Confidence in what? Confidence in whom? Is it confidence in the future of business? Is it confidence in the stability of our Government? Is it confidence in the legislative branch of Government? Where is the confidence needed? I am sorry the President was not plainer in what he had to say.

My own thought is that confidence in our fiscal system is the thing which is most urgently needed. Having that in my mind, I have voted for every measure proposed in this Chamber which had for its purpose the balancing of the Budget. I went through on the tax bill to the bitter end. I went through on the economy bill to the bitter end. I voted with the committee on every question that was submitted upon this floor. I did so feeling that it was of the very highest importance that we make the world and our own citizens to know that our Treasury was on a sound basis and that our fiscal affairs were above criticism. I also voted against the Goldsborough bill. So that nothing the President has said reaches me. I am not guilty.

The President indicts the House of Representatives. He indicts the majority, a majority composed of Members on both sides of the aisle. In some instances the majority was of Republicans and in other instances the majority was of Democrats. But he indicts the majority wherever it was and whoever it was. He charges them, in effect, with crimes and misdemeanors of the most serious nature. As I have said, I am not guilty. Yet, Mr. Chairman, I can not fail to resent on behalf of my associates in this House the affront which has been put upon them and the cruel injustice with which they have been pilloried before the world.

I supported the measures for taxation and for economy. They did not suit me in all respects, but I was willing to go along and to sink any doubt or any question that I might have as to the particular propriety of a certain detail. In doing so, it brought me into antagonism both with my personal and my political friends. I had to break from those with whom I had previously kept company. I had to set my face against a shower of propaganda second to none that may have fallen upon other Members of this House.

So it is with a clean conscience that I now say—and I now speak of only one detail of the economy program—the reduction in compensation to Federal employees, that provision died by the President's own hand. It was his hand that slew the effort to cut $40,000,000 or more from the Federal pay roll.

The President invited the Economy Committee to confer with him. They did confer; they exchanged views; they accepted some of his ideas; and they had a right to expect him to accept some of theirs and to go along with them. It was not fair or reasonable that he should expect them to surrender to him on every particular point—a mere matter of detail. Yet we find that when the committee had made their report and were beleaguered in this Chamber by every selfish interest which was touched by the economies proposed, under the President's influence and instigation a fight was brought on between those favoring the economies—a fight between those who favored the furlough plan of the President and the level percentage cut—and as a result of that division of its friends this $40,000,000 was lopped off of the proposal for economy.

The President's statement is an indictment of the House of Representatives. Waiving the matters of taste and of his abuse of his constitutional authority through cloaking himself in his constitutional prerogative and striking over the heads of Congress to public opinion—for that was the deliberate purpose—waiving the fact that this is Mr. Hoover's deficit; that it was he who was responsible for the maladministration which had produced this situation—when he presents his indictment against the Members of this House for the butchery of the economy bill, I say that if the Members are guilty, he is particeps criminis and the most guilty of all. [Applause.]

I do not object to criticism, and I should not object to a frank appeal by the President to the people of the country. I should not object to what the President has said if he had not said it in such a manner as he did. His manner was polemic, it was controversial, it was a challenge, it was provocative, it was intended to be an affront and was an affront to every Member of the House and should be resented as such.

It was a demagogic appeal to the galleries. Oh, we have had plenty of demagogues in Congress; we have them now, have had them always, and always will have them. But not all the demagogues are in Congress. Some of them have occupied the position of Chief Executive.

And whenever a President, under the cloak of his constitutional prerogative to address the House, flaunts us and misrepresents us with half truths and misleading statements, all intended to advance his political fortunes, then I am prepared to call such a man, whether President, Congressman, or whatever he may be, just a plain, ordinary, everyday, garden variety of demagogue, such as grace the soap boxes and the country schoolhouses. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, we do need a restoration of confidence. We need it badly. The lack of it is taking the color out of little children's cheeks. It is taking the clothing from men's backs. It is taking shelter from over their heads. It is driving men forth from every walk of life naked and barehanded, the fruits of a lifetime of toil and frugality wiped away with a sweep of the hand.

We need a restoration of confidence, most important of all, a restoration of confidence in the Government's fiscal system. We need a restoration of confidence in the stability of our Government—and let me say I have heard speeches made upon this floor during this session which were aimed right at the heart of public confidence in the Government of the United States.

We need a restoration of confidence in business—faith that there will soon come a time when we will be on an even keel with a fair and reasonable amount of good living for those who are industrious and saving.

We need all this; but may I call to the attention of the President of the United States that, more than all this, we need a restoration of confidence in Mr. Hoover. [Applause.]

The people of this country and Members of Congress, ourselves—because we are citizens like everybody else—need to have more faith in the fairness of the President, in his justice, in his sincerity, in his willingness in a time like this to forget partisan politics and his ability to rise like a statesman to do something for the common welfare of our country. [Applause.] What he has done in this message, with the reiteration of the unjust criticism in his appeal to the people which followed, is to diminish the confidence which the country must feel in him. The people may not know the facts now. They may give him the temporary applause, but the time will come, upon second thought and sober consideration, when they will know.

We need to restore the confidence of the people in this country. We need for the common man to know that the Government of the United States is sympathetic with suffering, that it recognizes its responsibility to every citizen, that it feels that no honest and industrious man should be allowed to starve because he can not find work to do. The people need that—oh, my God, how much they need that assurance. They stand to-day, millions of them, upon the brink of an awful fear—the fear of starvation. It is in the homes of millions of our people and gnawing at the hearts of the best of men.

At a time like this nothing could give such reassurance to the average citizen as for the Government to announce as a fundamental of its policy that no honest American shall be allowed to starve. [Applause.]

Nothing, Mr. Chairman, could give this reassurance better than for Congress, before it adjourns, to place this fund in the hands of Mr. Hoover, for the relief of the people when the failing resources upon which they depend have been exhausted and nothing remains to save them from starvation. [Applause.]

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] 20 minutes.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I imagine there is no one in this House who has a greater distaste for controversy than the one who now claims your attention for a short time. There was a time when controversy was a matter of keen delight to me, but that time has long passed. I rise now with great hesitation.

I do so for the purpose of commenting very briefly on a speech made yesterday by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] and also on some observations as to the prerogatives of the President which were made this morning by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Before addressing myself to this double purpose, let me make one comment on the speech of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON], who just addressed the House with his characteristic eloquence. He said that nothing would be quite so reassuring to the country as the assurance that no one in this country would be allowed to starve. Of course, translating the gentleman's expression into its intended application, he means assurance that the Federal Government will relieve the constituent States of their primary duty to attend to the destitute.

Let me say that, in my humble judgment, a reassurance could be given that would be far more stimulating to industry and trade—that is that Congress, after passing the appropriation bills, would adjourn and spare the country such "soap box" oratory as we have had this session. [Laughter and applause.]

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] took occasion to make an attack upon a leading citizen of my own State, one of the most generous and noblest philanthropists of our time, Cyrus H. K. Curtis.

His incentive for his attack was an editorial in the New York Evening Post, of which Mr. Curtis happens to be indirectly an owner, in which some too vehement and hasty language was used with respect to Mr. RANKIN. I do not criticize Mr. RANKIN for rising to a question of personal privilege and answering the extreme language in a part of this editorial. But the gentleman from Mississippi went farther and made an attack on Mr. Curtis as a rich man and on the rich as such.

He mentioned the fact that Mr. Curtis happens to be a man of considerable means, and stated that when wealth becomes unduly concentrated a nation is threatened with extinction, citing the school-boy illustration of ancient Rome. In my judgment ancient Rome did not perish so much from its rich men as from its idlers, who frequented the circus and the theater and forgot the sterner duties of the state in idle pleasures. The Roman people lost their sense of the stern values of life.

To the offense of being a rich man Mr. Curtis must plead guilty. No dollar he ever earned has any taint. To be rich is a new and unheard of crime in this land of opportunity. Our institutions make the honest accumulation of wealth a possibility. A "fair field and no favor," the "tools to him who can use them," the "square deal," import the right of a man to earn and retain the legitimate results of his skill in industry, and are basic principles in American society or else I wholly misapprehend the nature of our institutions. But the gentleman from Mississippi could have indicted Mr. Curtis even more severely. He might have said that Mr. Curtis is guilty of the additional crime of having started as a poor boy, selling newspapers at 2 cents apiece on the streets of Portland, and then by a long life of industry, patience, skill, judgment, and foresight amassing the large fortune that he has. So he might also have added a count to the indictment that Mr. Curtis has made the most generous use of that wealth, for members of the Curtis family have been among the outstanding philanthropists of this generation. His daughter, Mrs. Edward W. Bok, has given about twelve millions to found a music school, in which no one is asked to pay a penny for tuition, and in which those who have not the means of study, even with free tuition, are supported by the school in order to develop their talent. Mr. Curtis has been foremost in nearly every great public movement for the benefit of mankind in Philadelphia and Pennsylvania, and to some extent in the United States. If he has a large income, he has given it, save the modest expenses of his own life, to the public good. Such rich men would never destroy this or any nation.

I would not say so much if it were not for the fact that the speech of the gentleman from Mississippi has not been the only speech made in this session in which there has been, intentionally or otherwise, an appeal to class passion, in order to array the poor and the unfortunate against those who by honest industry have amassed a greater or lesser fortune. Let me say such utterances are far more fatal to the public peace than the mere possession of wealth by individuals in this country. It is easy to make these speeches, and then, like Mark Antony, say:

> Now let it work. Mischief, thou art afoot,
> Take thou what course thou wilt!

If there ever was a time in our history in which inflammatory appeals to class passions are dangerous to the Republic, it is at this time, when millions are without work and therefore peculiarly susceptible to such appeals. Conceding the just provocative of an intemperate attack by a subeditor of a New York paper in Mr. RANKIN'S case, the fact remains that this is the time when all classes of America ought to be like the instruments of an orchestra, each playing his part, whether it be the drum or the first violin, or even wielding the baton, but each playing his part and contributing to a symphony of good will in America and not a hymn of social hate. [Applause.]

Let me now briefly comment upon the speech of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] delivered by him with characteristic force this morning. It was a criticism of the President's conception of the high prerogatives of his great office. The gentleman suggested that the President ought to read the Constitution of the United States. I will so far agree by saying that not only the President but the Members of this Congress and every citizen of the Republic could very profitably reread the Constitution of the United States, because, like the Bible, I suspect it is generally more respected than read. At all events, it would not do any harm to any official, from the highest to the lowest, to view the wise grants of power, which the master builders of the Republic prescribed in that Constitution. Indeed, this terrible situation in which we find ourselves, with a deficit of over $2,000,000,000, is, in the last analysis, attributable to the fact that the representatives of the people, whether in executive or legislative departments of the Government, have so enlarged and extended the boundaries of Federal power by the creation of unconstitutional bureaus, that if Hamilton, Jefferson, Franklin, or Washington were to revisit this world and consider the Constitution, as it is now interpreted and applied, he would not recognize his own handiwork. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] could profitably reread not merely the Constitution but its historic background in this matter of the presidential prerogative. That historic background was the tragic impotence of the Continental Congress to be a legislature, an executive, and a judiciary at the same time. One of the great objectives of the Constitutional Convention was to create a strong and powerful executive, and they did so with characteristic simplicity and elasticity of language. They said:

> The executive power is hereby vested in a President of the United States.

That meant a great deal to those who are familiar with the history of the English-speaking race. They said he should have the power and duty of giving information to the Congress. "Information to the Congress" meant that the President must, like the captain on the bridge of a ship, view the entire state of the Union, and from time to time advise the Congress as to the conditions, which required a declaration of legislative policy. The Constitution further imposes upon him the duty to recommend measures for the welfare of the Union, and the power "to recommend," necessarily made the Chief Executive the leader of the American people in primarily suggesting public policies. Then, above all, it said that he should carry out and execute the policies of Congress. How can a President, if he is confronted with compulsory expenditures and no adequate revenues, do otherwise than advise Congress that with a deficit and consequent inability to carry out its mandates, their action is required, either in restricted expenditure or in enlarged revenues?

That is all the President has done in this case. If President Hoover has made any mistake, it has been in too great solicitude for what might be called the proprieties of procedure between the President and the Congress. In other words, he is the leader of the American people, respected as such, and chosen by their free suffrages; and it is his duty, even in normal times and, a fortiori, in abnormal times like the present, to take the lead, to be the captain on the bridge, and advise the Congress not only what they should do, but to bring to their attention their failure to do the things which the public good imperatively requires.

This he has done and nothing more; and the suggestion that the President has in any way violated the prerogatives of Congress has no basis, either in the Constitution or in the history that is its great background and chief interpreter.

What has our President done to cause the violent criticism? The ship of state—when he took the helm—started out with clear skies and blue seas. Almost immediately it ran into possibly the most terrific and cyclonic storm of depression in our history, and certainly the greatest that can be recalled by the memory of living man. In those three years, under most trying circumstances, he has stood on the bridge, enveloped by a fog of misrepresentation, assailed by an icy sleet of bitter and partisan misrepresentation, never sparing himself, always on the bridge by night and day, trying to navigate the ship through the terrific gale in which it found itself; and all the thanks he gets, if we can judge from some of the speeches from the right side of the aisle, is that because, during those three years, he did not loudly claim that the ship was going down, that we were all doomed, he is to be criticized because the gale has lasted longer than anyone anticipated.

Mr. Chairman, some of you and I have been on the Atlantic when our ship was confronted by a gale of three or four days, and with all of the attendant perils of the mighty sea, and if there is one thing that is essential to bring the ship out of the storm and into the safe harbor of its destination it is that the captain and the crew should work loyally together. If the officers and subordinate seamen slur the captain, sneer at him, and whisper that he does not know how to navigate the ship, then the ship is indeed in danger. This is true of the present cyclonic storm. Similarly our captain would be unworthy of his position as one charged with the chief responsibility to bring the ship to a safe harbor if he said, "We are going down; there is no hope; we can not outride this storm; the icy waves will soon submerge us."

What is wanted is faith and courage, and such President Hoover has had through these three trying years in high measure.

The policy of despair would make a craven of any captain. As I have said, the President of our good ship has stood bravely on the bridge, and to argue now because two years ago he said better times were coming he should be a subject of legitimate criticism seems to me a strange conception of the duty of a captain in a great storm.

Gentlemen, in my judgment all parties and all generations of Americans are responsible, so far as governmental policies are responsible, for the truly critical condition in which we find ourselves. This is no time for one party to criticize the other or vice versa for mere considerations of party expediency. I say that because, in the first place, the vulnerable heel of our form of government, otherwise as strong as Achilles, is the power of appropriation. Our fathers vainly thought they were creating a government of limited powers. If they were alive to-day, they would see that by the abuse of the power of appropriation, as to which any censorship of the judiciary is impracticable, we have become a Government of almost unlimited power, with a socialistic character, almost as great as that of Russia itself in its intimate meddling into the life of the individual and his activities. That has led to the creation of 150 bureaus, at least 50 of which have no possible sanction in any grant of power in the Constitution. [Applause.]

I would like to commend a suggestion to my good friend from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE], who has done such valorous and excellent work as the chairman of the Economy Committee. I supported the action of that committee in every vote that was taken with the one exception of the consolidation of the Army and Navy, and I even voted for that in the Committee of the Whole, although I confess on the motion to recommit I changed my vote and voted against the consolidation. Believing that this session began with a fine exhibition of bipartisan patriotism, when high-minded leaders of both parties had loyally worked together without any selfish interest except to save this country in its present deplorable condition, I supported the recommendations of that committee with this one exception.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. BECK. I was about to suggest to my friend from Alabama that there ought to be created a bipartisan commission to consider the true powers of this Government, to report next December as to the constitutional justification of some of these bureaus. I know that commissions have generally been rather abortive and suggest those promissory notes, which Micawber used to give his creditors with the exclamation, "Thank God, that debt is paid." Many commissions are promissory notes that are never ultimately paid. But I would like to see a bipartisan commission of the Senate and House, composed of the leading lawyers of both Houses, which would consider between now and December the justification under the Constitution of the many bureaus of this Government, which usurp the functions of the States and interfere in a most socialistic way with the intimate life of the individual, as, for example, the bureau which tells the American mother how she shall sew Willie's pants or how window curtains are to be hung in order to insure privacy and how in 10,000 ways the life of American citizens should be regulated by unconstitutional Federal bureaus, I was about to say from the cradle to the grave. But, as a matter of fact, the one thing for which there is not a Federal bureau is the grave. I hesitate to make that statement, because the way all of these bureaus are created makes me fear that this speech may suggest the creation of another bureau. If my speech is read—which it will not be—some one of the class that we used to call undertakers but who are now called morticians will get some Members of Congress to slip in an appropriation of $20,000 to inquire into sanitary methods of interment. That will result in a new bureau, the head of it, presumably, the mortician, and he will be called the chief mortician of the United States. He will then subdivide it into a half dozen bureaus, one of which will investigate the method of Etruscan burials, another the method of Roman burials, and another the method of Aztec burials.

The bureau will have its full complement of employees and its own methods of propaganda and "ballyhoo," and presently you will find the Congress will be appropriating about a quarter of a million dollars a year for this mortician's bureau, and the Chief Mortician of the United States, having a little brief authority, will become one of the great bureaucrats of the United States. [Laughter.]

Thus these bureaus are born and thus they die. But no; they never die. Like the immortal Cleopatra, they have "immortal longings."

This is a fanciful illustration, but I could duplicate it a hundred times; and if we could once restore this Government to its original channels of power, as prescribed by the wisdom of the fathers, we could save this country at least one-fourth of a billion dollars. [Applause.]

There is a second suggestion that I want to make, in which respect I think the Executive has a greater responsibility than we have, and I want to commend this to the attention of the Executive.

It can not be questioned, since the removal-from-office case of Meyers v. The United States (272 U. S.), which I happened to argue, that the President has the constitutional power to remove, a power which can not be controlled or restricted by Congress in any way. This high prerogative means that if the President deems it in the public interest that any member of the executive departments should be removed such is his power. The Supreme Court has so stated.

This gives him a power, directly or indirectly, to remove any official in the executive department for whom the public service has no real need. He need not appoint a successor and can not be compelled to do so.

I do not believe that the average Federal employee is overpaid. I think those who have eight hours' work to do and work that requires skill and judgment are grossly underpaid, but I say, and I say this as one, who at four different times and under four administrations has served in the executive department of the Federal Government, that these departments all have upon their rolls many Government employees, some of whom have not an hour's work to do a day. They fool around in the corridors, speculate between themselves how to raise themselves in classification, and in general kill time.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECK. No; please let me continue.

Mr. BLANTON. I wonder why the President does not remove them.

Mr. BECK. If the gentleman will allow me, that is exactly what I am coming to. I wish I had a little more time, because this is a feature of this economy program that has received very scant discussion and admits of a very summary remedy.

Let me illustrate by stating that in the administration of that great and wise President, Grover Cleveland, he knew that the departments had thousands of useless employees who were feeding at the public crib and doing little or nothing in return for their salaries, and he instructed his Secretary of the Treasury to make an examination of the Treasury Department. Secretary Carlisle did so, and as a result of a careful canvass he developed that there were some hundreds—I have forgotten how many—who had sinecures. Thereupon, one Monday morning, Secretary Carlisle removed these useless employees. Then Congress was empty for the next two or three days. There were no Members here. They were all hurrying to the Treasury Department, and the pressure of Congress was so great upon the administration that the order was revoked. Thus the wise policy of economy of Grover Cleveland was defeated by Congress. How often that has happened since.

If the President would tell each member of his Cabinet to appoint three discreet men to go through each department and ascertain the employees that did not have an honest day's work, it would develop at once why this Government is the most overmanned government in the world, with its 800,000 civilian employees.

The President thus, by the power of removal, could eliminate the deadwood from the department.

Ah, but you say that would add to the unemployed. Yes; that is true; but let me say that the failure of this Congress to economize and the appeals to class passion, of which I have spoken, have done more to swell the volume of unemployment in this country than any other cause. [Applause.] The bread lines are lengthening because confidence in industry is being destroyed by inflammatory appeals in this Congress to class passion and because this Congress is halting and obstructing and defeating the wise measures for economy and reform to please professional lobbyists and special classes.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECK. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. I would like to know who does the thing the gentleman is charging here, and who has done it.

Mr. BECK. Who?

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman is charging here that this Congress is working to arouse the passions of men, and I would like to have the gentleman point out who has been doing that.

Mr. BECK. It would be invidious to do so. I have so kindly a feeling for every Member of this House that if I should individuate the speeches from the beginning of this Congress that have been appeals to class passion I would hurt many a good friend. If there be any doubt in the mind of any Member on this subject, let him read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and he will see appeals to the passions and despair of the masses that would have caused a revolution in any other country. The sober self-restraint of the Americans in this crisis has been admirable beyond words, and this has saved this country from bloody riots in the cities. If my friend does not know of these speeches, then he has not been present when they have been delivered, and I commend him to the reading of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECK. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. The gentleman mentioned the creation of 150 bureaus, most of which we are to assume are unnecessary, and the gentleman stated that some 50 of them are actually unconstitutional. Would the gentleman be willing to give the House the names of some of these bureaus? So far the statements that have been made on the floor of the House have been very general, and I would like to know what are some of these bureaus.

Mr. BECK. I will give the gentleman one—the Maternity Bureau. No one who has voted for it and who has ever studied the Constitution can question the fact that no power was ever granted by the Constitution to the Federal Government to prescribe for American mothers how they could either bear or care for their children, and my own belief is that the unmarried ladies who run that bureau can not teach the average American mother anything on the subject of maternity. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman, while Solicitor General, defended the constitutionality of that act.

Mr. BECK. The gentleman from New York is quite right. I am glad the gentleman referred to that. It involves quite an amusing story. I was Solicitor General, and it was my duty to defend the constitutionality of any legislation presumably valid. One band of ladies, who were against the legislation, called on President Harding and said I was too prejudiced to argue it, and another band, in favor of it, made the same statement. However, that kindly President allowed me to argue the case. The argument I made, and which prevailed, was that the Supreme Court could not ex necessitate rei sit as a censor of appropriations. That is a vulnerable part of the Constitution.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECK. I yield.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman suggests the Children's Bureau, which has a trifling appropriation and small activities. I wonder why the gentleman picks on that instead of the Department of Commerce and the Bureau of Roads. Why strain at a gnat and swallow a camel?

Mr. BECK. My answer is that when our colleague, Mr. NOLAN, suddenly launched the question, the Maternity Bureau was the first illustration that came into my mind, possibly because it is the most glaring, but my friend from Alabama is right in regard to many bureaus in the Department of Commerce and in the Department of Labor. The Department of Agriculture is the worst offender. Over its grandiose structure should be written: "Sacred to the memory of the Constitution of the United States." Many of its bureaus can find no possible justification in any grant of Federal power.

Mr. YON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECK. I yield.

Mr. YON. Does not the gentleman think that if appropriations made for Federal aid for roads could be distributed to the States themselves under the authority of Congress without being tied up and prescribed with so much red tape, it would be better?

Mr. BECK. That is another question, but without much reflection, I think my friend is right; we had better give it to the States, if we are thus to misapply the public revenues for the benefit of sections.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECK. I will.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman from Alabama suggested the abolition of the Bureau of Roads, and the gentleman from Florida has added his contribution. The State of Alabama has been a beneficiary of the aid to roads, and the only restriction we put on it is that they shall not use convict labor.

Mr. BECK. The State of Pennsylvania contributes $2 to the cost of these roads and gets back $1, while the State of Texas contributes $1 and gets back $7. [Laughter.]

Gentlemen, I have taken entirely too much time.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, go ahead.

Mr. BECK. It is rather tempting to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. BECK. And, besides, there are other demands for time on my side.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECK. If I have the time to yield.

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. McSWAIN. If the gentleman went out house cleaning for the President, and went to the Veterans' Bureau, which disburses 25 per cent of the total Federal revenue, and found that the chief legal adviser is a man who had never tried a case in court, does he not think that he would exercise the power under the case of United States against Meyer and at least put one more unemployed on the road?

Mr. BECK. I know nothing about the merits of that particular matter; but it is fair to say that the President, notwithstanding this very great power of removal, is the President of a nation of 120,000,000 people and he can not give attention to the details of so many great departments. However, if the gentleman's facts are as stated, and I believe they are, I would remove such a man before the dawn of the morning. [Applause.]

Finally, let me say this: I came into this discussion without any adequate preparation. I only wanted to defend a friend, a very noble man. I refer to Mr. Cyrus H. K. Curtis. By the way, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], whom I advised I intended to reply to his speech, jokingly said, "You will give a Shakespearean quotation about Mr. Curtis." I had not thought of it, but here is one:

> His life is gentle, and the elements
> So mix'd in him that nature might stand up
> And say to all the world "This is a man!"

I have taken the liberty in this quotation of changing the tense of the quotation.

If we are to preserve the priceless heritage of the fathers, the Constitution, and save ourselves from sinking into the mire of a bureaucratic socialism, then "back to the Constitution." [Applause.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCMILLAN].

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I am sure every Member of the House has been profoundly impressed with the remarks just made by our friend, the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK]. I have always admired his brilliancy; and his ability, I think, is respected and recognized by every Member of this body.

We have had now for a couple of days, as I believe everyone will agree, what might be termed a "tea party," discussing the pros and cons of political strategy recently called into being as a result of certain messages this body has received from the President of the United States. For a few minutes I shall undertake something of a constructive character. [Applause.]

I desire to discuss H. R. 11677, a bill to amend section 15-a of the interstate commerce act, and for other purposes. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House has recently concluded its hearings on this bill and has favorably reported same to the House for its consideration. I desire at this time to congratulate the membership of this committee for its action, and to express the hope that the distinguished chairman, Mr. RAYBURN, of Texas, will press for immediate consideration on this proposed legislation.

The ordinary student, I believe, of our national affairs has been able to observe during the past few years a very decided shift in the center of gravity in our transportation facilities. It is well, perhaps, to abolish many useless regulations that have been prescribed by authority of Congress and the Interstate Commerce Commission. Many millions of dollars have been appropriated, for regulatory purposes, to a commission composed of experts, to superregulate what is now almost a defunct and bankrupt industry. This question, like many others, has challenged the initiative and intelligence of every Member of this House, and I am sure I can state without fear of contradiction that every single Member of this body has made an effort, and will continue to do so, as far as is humanly possible, to find the trouble.

Business is on a dead center, and we owe it to the Nation, individually and collectively, as Members of Congress, to try to start it again in motion by removing every possible handicap. Never before, in my judgment, has business been for so long a time in need of all of the cooperation and encouragement it is possible to give it. Various Members, I am sure, have entertained different ideas, different opportunities, privileges, and desires to study and observe the character of legislation as has been proposed during the past few years, and its probable effect upon business. The reaction of the membership, it seems to me, would be valuable in our joint efforts to lift this country out of the business chaos which is now everywhere very evident. For myself, I have undertaken to give considerable thought and study of the effect of many of the commission's regulations regarding the railroad industry. Long before I was honored to sit as a Member of this body I questioned the ultimate value of our "overproduction" of this class of legislation. Everyone having an impartial attitude will, I believe, agree that the railroads to-day are on the brink of bankruptcy. Proof for this statement is revealed by a casual observation of the decline of the value of railroad securities on the stock exchanges. Business conditions generally, of course, have played their part which has brought about a decline in railroad stocks, but in a very large measure such declines, in my judgment, have been due entirely to superregulation.

Under the transportation act of 1920 the railroads of this country were given little opportunity or inducement to protect themselves against the lean years with which they are now confronted. Congress, of course, is responsible, therefore, for the passage of this legislation. It is our duty as a result for this Congress to try to remedy a condition that the act of a former Congress has brought about. Careful study of the act of 1920 will convince you that it is nothing short of a Chinese puzzle and the question of revenues contained therein flagrantly violates every fundamental economic law. The railroads, it must be remembered, are subject to the same economic forces as any other business activity or concern. They, like any other firm or corporation, will have good years and bad years, and unless they are granted a subsidy, which I do not favor, should be permitted under this act to build up a surplus in their operations in prosperous years to enable them to survive in times of depression. The recapture clause of the transportation act of 1920 deprives them of this privilege. If I am any judge of the financial conditions of our railroads to-day, the Federal and State Governments are going to have to release without delay the strangle hold on their operating methods, if we are ever to expect them to come back with any degree as going business concerns of even fair rank and importance. Unless given some degree of cooperation, relief, and encouragement, the railroads of our country will never again regain their former position of stability and permanency nor their stock or bonds be attractive as an investment to the public, nor will they appeal to the best operating talent of executives and employees.

Everyone, I believe, will admit that the future expansion and development of this country will continue as heretofore to demand modern railroad facilities, not so much perhaps as in the past, but still they are indispensable. Undoubtedly this is a serious problem, and it does not require a wizard or prophet to determine the fact that it is necessary to give immediate consideration and relief to the railroad industry as a whole or take them over under Government operation and control. The total book value of the railroads of the country to-day is approximately $20,000,000,000. Which horn of the dilemma shall the Government take? Will we give them a chance for their life or run the risk of taking our own? This question naturally suggests itself in the light of our present financial difficulties. The Government's devastating experience in the operation of the railroads during the World War and immediately thereafter should serve as ample notice to us to keep out of the transportation business.

In the light of our past experience regarding this problem, and under existing conditions, I am convinced that it is only the part of wisdom and economy to curtail and eliminate many of the costly and unnecessary activities of the Interstate Commerce Commission, reserving, of course, a sufficient organization to protect the public against any possible discrimination or unfair practices. All of this meddling, accounting, and useless regulation in its numerous forms is costly and reflects itself in tariff rates that your constituents and mine are called upon to pay.

The truth is the day of usefulness of the Interstate Commerce Commission to our country has about passed. No longer are stringent regulations by the Federal Government essentially necessary. Railroad competition of a serious character should not now arise in the transportation industry. Any student of economic questions must recognize that competition itself is a safe, sure, and inexpensive regulator to all avenues of business; but, when associated, as the railroads are, with unregulated and uncontrolled competition, as we observe now, our railroad regulations assume a form of strangulation.

The railroad industry in normal times and under normal conditions employed more men, bought more goods and equipment, and suffered more from "our legislative overproduction" than any other industry in America. To-day this same industry has more work waiting to be done as soon as business demands justify than any other two industries combined we might name. Their sidetracks and terminals are literally loaded with "bad-order" cars and locomotives, but their present and past experience with our avalanche of superregulations has been disastrous to their very interests. Naturally they are doubtful and discouraged over the outlook far beyond the present effect of the current depression. The financial morale of the railroads is one of the most important factors in the affairs of this Nation, and for one I am ready to help restore what I am constrained to believe the Congress has in a major part destroyed.

Our railroads are no longer in a strict sense a monopoly. Rigid regulations are no longer a necessity. Initial encouragement I believe desired by them, is less meddling and interference by Congress and the Interstate Commerce Commission. What they desire, in my judgment, the opportunity they want, is more latitude and the privilege of running their own business. Such, if permitted, would restore to them the initiative and incentive of former years, and which if permitted would return to the public as much or more benefits now in this competitive age of transportation than any regulations or restrictions that may be imposed by law or by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

We, now, specify the rates of charge, scales of pay, and limit their net income. Gentlemen, such rules and regulations will destroy every vestige of incentive, initiative, and interest, in any individual or business industry in the country. It does more than that. It oftentimes encourages dishonest practice. Moreover, basing tariffs on limited or reduced income is wrong in principle.

I have already made some references to the inconsistencies found in the transportation act of 1920, but in addition I want to make a few direct observations on its many intricacies, unworkable features, multitude of doubts, and violations of the most fundamental laws. A comprehension of many of the provisions of the act in its practical application makes its continuance unwise and unfair for regulatory purposes. It is an elaborate piece of machinery, so elaborate as to be unworkable in many of its parts. I am constrained to believe that the commissioners themselves regard the provision of this act in the same manner as I do with respect to its practical application and operation.

Listen to what Commissioner Aitchison had to say on this point on October 14, 1919, then chairman of the commission, and quoted recently by Commissioner Eastman, on page 5 of the hearings before the committee. Commissioner Aitchison was speaking to the National Association of Railway and Utilities Commissioners. Here is what he says:

Some practical difficulties occur in carrying out a legislative direction to raise a precise sum of money or to produce a certain percentage of return. Stability in rates is regarded by the users of railroads as of great importance, as investments are made, and contracts are undertaken upon long-established relationships, and unforeseen rate fluctuations often have an extremely disturbing effect. Great financial hardships have followed unanticipated rate changes. If a certain fixed percentage is to be yielded each carrier, or each group of carriers, year by year, periodical rate fluctuates will be inevitable.

Whether a schedule will yield a certain percentage of return depends on the growth or shrinkage of business, the rise and fall in the prices of manufacture and labor, the extent to which shrinkage in traffic can be met by reduced operating expenses, and the efficiency of management and labor. Each of these variable factors has a marked effect on the net income in the railroad business, and each is beyond the control of the rate regulatory tribunal.

An examination of the hearings will disclose other similar statements, and all of them have caused me to doubt the ability of the act being applied with any degree of accuracy or fairness to the railroad industry. To prove the uncertainty, the unworkable, and unexpected results of the recapture clause of the act of 1920, I will read again from the hearings before the committee a part of Commissioner Eastman's statement found on page 8 of the hearings:

It may be of interest to know that, treating each year for each carrier as a separate examination, the Bureau of Accounts has made, up to January 1, 3,854 accounting examinations to determine recapturable income. In 3,015 cases there has been a final determination and in 839 cases a tentative termination. Combining these 2,386 cases the bureau increased and in 1,155 cases it decreased the income reported. In 313 cases it made no change. The aggregate net railway operating income determined was $3,828,615,930.05, which was $62,141,125.54 more than the amount reported by the carriers.

And then, in the next paragraph of his statement to the committee, he makes this significant remark:

It is impossible to make any accurate estimate of the amount due under the recapture provisions, prior to final reports and orders. And even then the orders may be upset by the courts. It is only possible—to make a rough estimate, which must be given with all manner of reservations and to which it would be a mistake to attach much weight.

He says:

Later on, in Commissioner Eastman's testimony before the committee, he makes another significant statement. He said:

Present conditions are brought sharply into the foreground, which is perhaps the strongest objection of all. For the moment practically all the railroads are financially weak, and nobody knows how long this condition will continue. It is probable that the revival of their credit will lag very considerably behind the revival of business conditions. While I believe that their traffic and earnings will ultimately be restored, they have a hard struggle ahead, not only with business conditions but also with competing forms of transportation. Repeal of recapture for the future is not of much present importance, for there is likely to be little, if anything, to recapture for some time to come. Retroactive repeal covering the past is of very great importance. To the extent that we find amounts of any considerable size, due in the proceedings now pending, there are few, if any, railroads which have cash enough on hand to pay them and still fewer which could do so without robbing Peter to pay Paul. To obtain the necessary cash it would for the most part be necessary to issue securities to replenish their treasuries, and there are few which are now able to issue securities on reasonable terms, if at all. Some will have to borrow money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to meet maturities, and it is probable that among them will be roads of past excellent credit. There are better uses to which the slender railroad credit, so far as it is available, can be put than to raise cash to pay to the Government excess income of the past, which in most cases is more than balanced by the income deficiencies of the present.

Then summing up the situation, Commissioner Eastman said:

We are of the opinion that the difficulties, disadvantages, and dangers of recapture far outweigh its possible advantages. This is true of the future, but it is even more true of the past, particularly under the conditions which now exist and may be anticipated for some time to come. This being our conclusion, we see no escape from the conclusion that the present recapture proceedings should be discontinued and the money returned which is now in the contingent fund. This money can not in fairness be retained unless we are prepared to go ahead with recapture and treat all roads alike. That we do not recommend, for the reasons which I have given.

You will observe from Commissioner Eastman's testimony before the committee, as I have read to you, that it is impossible to do this, and to do that, and the courts are then likely to do the other. It is observed, also in his testimony before the committee, the records of the Interstate Commerce Commission show that the Seaboard Air Line, one of the trunk lines of the South, the sheriffs of the country have been about to padlock for years, is due the Government materially more under the recapture clause than the Louisville & Nashville, one of the most successful railroads of the country.

Gentlemen, I wish to propound this one brief question: Do you believe there is any commission under high heaven that can make rates for railroads in order to produce certain returns in season and out of season? If not, then an essential function of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in my judgment, has been an expensive and misguided philosophy.

In summing up my remarks, here are my concrete conclusions on legislation affecting the transportation lines of the country: If the railroads now have to meet competition of a very intense nature and they do, we must return to the sound principles of competition in business and remove some of the restrictions, laws, and regulations that empower the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix and determine rates and return to policies which prevailed in former years, retaining for the Interstate Commerce Commission, however, sufficient veto power to correct any discrimination and rates which may appear excessive and unfair. Under such a policy we would allow the railroads in certain fields at least to meet competition without regulation or restriction. With a hope of eliminating some of the cost of government, we now hear so much about, and to offer again an opportunity within reasonable limitations to business initiative and ingenuity in the railroad industry are the reasons which have prompted me to make these observations on this vital subject.

I, therefore, express the hope that Congress may soon have an opportunity of considering and passing H. R. 11677, and other legislation to rehabilitate and to bring about greater confidence and stability to America's greatest and most indispensable industry—the railroads of the country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE].

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, the Washington Star last Sunday contained an instructive article on the employment situation by William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor. Mr. Green rightly suggests that the depression is not so much the cause of unemployment as unemployment is a cause of the depression. He stated:

The calamity has not been brought about solely by business depression. The depression more probably has been one of its effects, rather than one of its causes * * *. For several years before the stock-market crash turned business into a downward swing industrial unemployment was on the steady increase. It started two or three years after the World War and climbed steadily during the intervening years * * *. Even in the prosperous years of 1925 and 1926 more than 1,600,000 wage earners were out of employment and in 1929, at the peak of prosperity, the number had grown to 2,400,000.

For example, out of the 2,000,000 men employed on Class I railroads in 1920 only 1,300,000 were employed in the first six months of 1931. Larger engines and cars, longer trains and improved equipment enabled the railroads to transport more freight and passengers in 1931 with fewer men than 10 years before. Prior to the stock-market collapse of 1929 labor-saving processes had already caused many railroad employees to be laid off. These folks had to find work in other industries or go unemployed.

Another example is the automatic signal at railroad crossings, which is replacing the crossing watchman and gateman. From 1924 to 1930 there was an actual decrease of 3,172 workers in this class, despite the fact that 7,963 more crossings were protected in 1930 than in 1924.

Consider the change in telephone operation. In 1930 the Bell companies employed 143,979. If the number of calls per operator had remained the same in 1930, as it has been before, 69,421 more operators than were employed would have been required; but the substitution of the dial-call system has greatly increased the number of calls one operator can handle and has brought about a decrease of two-thirds in the employment afforded by the old manual operation of switchboards.

In 1923 the average number employed in coal mining was 860,000. By 1929, as a result of the use of coal-mining machinery, the number fell to 654,000, a decrease of 24 per cent.

The farm population is now 4,000,000 less than in 1920, and the number of persons gainfully employed in agriculture has probably dropped more than 1,000,000, although farm production has increased.

On the other hand, in public utilities, in building construction, and in some branches of industry, manufacturing new inventions, such as airplanes and the radio, it has been possible to employ men and women who otherwise would have been without work because of the increased use of labor-saving machinery and processes. Counteracting the benefits of this class of increased employment, however, is the increased use of child labor. Fully a million children who should be at school now are gainfully employed. This is not only an economic anomaly, it is a national disgrace.

We are now in a period of readjustment. We see new industries developing, and these take up some of the slack in employment caused by transition from the manual labor system to that of labor-saving processes. Ultimately the slack will thus be taken up altogether, if children are removed from the labor market; but in the meantime we have many people suffering the hardship of unemployment because of the slowness of the readjustment.

The present depression creates an emergency which requires prompt governmental action. What is the remedy? There is no one remedy, no cure-all or panacea. Mr. Green suggests the 5-day week in industry. The President's Organization on Unemployment Relief, headed by Walter S. Gifford, likewise has recommended the spreading of work, and this plan has already been approved by M. J. Florsheim, president of the Florsheim Shoe Co., and Robert A. Weaver, president of the Ferro Enamel Corporation. Many other proposals for relief have been made. No one remedy, however, is adequate. A separate plan will be necessary to improve each individual phase of the problem.

My suggestion is registration of aliens. It would afford relief for American workmen from competition with those 400,000 or more aliens who are here unlawfully and who are filling the positions of Americans. Admittedly, registration of aliens will not cure all our ills, but it will aid materially in improving employment conditions in this country. Our first duty is to Americans, and American workmen we must protect.

For 100 years after the signing of the Declaration of Independence there was no restriction of immigration to the United States. In 1820, the first year of any record, only 8,385 aliens came here. By 1882 the number had increased to 388,992. In that year Congress passed an act excluding undesirable aliens. Thereby our selective and restrictive immigration policy was first instituted.

In 1917 Congress increased the classes of inadmissible aliens; by that act the physically, the mentally, and the morally unfit were barred from coming to our shores. In 1921 all Europe, war torn and depressed, seemed to wish to come to the United States and compete with the workmen of this country. American consuls, through the State Department, reported this situation to the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization. America then for the first time limited by number those who could be admitted from Europe. The European quota was set at 352,000 per year. The public, however, continued to demand further restriction for the protection of the workingman, and the House of Representatives, by a vote of 323 to 71, passed the present Johnson quota law of 1924, reducing the number of admissible Europeans to 153,821 per year.

It is commonly believed that immigration problems no longer exist in the United States. It is true that last year, for the first time since the Civil War, the net fiscal gain in population by lawful immigration was but 35,000. During the month of February, 1932, under the administration's policy of enforcing the "likely to become a public charge" provision of the immigration law, only 6 per cent of the quota was issued, 94 per cent being unissued.

The number of lawful admissions has gradually been reduced since 1921, but the number of aliens coming to this country in the same period of time has greatly increased. The more legal restrictions imposed, so much the greater becomes the pressure to enter this country. Many nations now are overcrowded. Attracted by America's wealth and resources, and being denied lawful admission, thousands have come here each year unlawfully.

The restrictive-immigration policy to protect workers of this Nation is threatened. There is great danger of a breakdown in the effectiveness of our laws. Conspiracies to violate our immigration measures extend not only into Canada and Mexico but also into the countries of Europe and Asia.

Barred by the 1921 quota act, bootlegging of immigrants into the United States started on a great scale. Wholesale racketeering sprang up. Smuggling aliens into this country and blackmailing them after their unlawful entry has rapidly increased from year to year. Investigations by the Department of Labor have disclosed that aliens have been hidden away on incoming ships, packed and crated as ordinary freight, hidden in the coal, or concealed in empty ship tanks; they also were brought in by automobile and by airplane.

They have been coming on passports, reentry permits, identification cards, birth and other certificates, all of which are forged, and such documents for use in unlawful entry are sold at high prices by racketeers. Even offices and agencies have been established, so that unsuspecting persons are led to believe that they are dealing with officials of the Immigration Service. The bootlegging-of-aliens racket has gone so far that price lists for illegal entry have been published, and these prices run into the hundreds of dollars.

Illegal entry, however, is by no means the only danger. Thousands of alien seamen enter the United States lawfully, subject only to the requirement that they reship to a foreign port within 60 days from the date of entry. It is estimated that in some years as many as 25,000 alien seamen desert their ships and remain here, lost in the great centers of our population. There are others, too, who are lawfully admitted and who remain here after their allotted time has expired. I refer to those who come here temporarily as students or for business or pleasure. It is estimated that more than 400,000 aliens are now in this country in violation of our law.

If Congress at the time it passed the 1921 quota act had also required the registration of aliens in the United States, there would not to-day be such widespread and defiant violation of our immigration laws. I have introduced a bill, H. R. 10669, providing that every alien lawfully in the United States shall each year be registered by public-school teachers in charge of citizenship classes or by clerks of naturalization courts. The fee required would be waived in event the alien is without work. A certificate of registration, containing his photograph, fingerprints, and description, would be issued to each registrant. These certificates would identify the alien and protect him. The holder would be secure against the racketeer, and the fee could be used for his education.

If we had had a registration law during the last 11 years, most of the aliens who have entered the United States illegally would have stayed at home. Those who did enter unlawfully could have been detected and deported; alien seamen would have reshipped within the time required by law.

We can strengthen our deportation policy by alien registration. Not one of those 400,000 or more aliens now here unlawfully has qualified for admission. Some of them may be criminals or believe in the doctrine of overthrowing this Government by force or violence. Others may be mentally unfit and therefore public charges; many of them undoubtedly are physically unfit, a menace to the public health.

It is unfair to permit these aliens, who have entered in defiance of our law, and whose presence here is coupled with a contempt for our ideals and institutions, to remain here. Their competition is unfair to American workmen and to aliens lawfully in the United States. Last year the Department of Labor deported 20,000 aliens. Let us facilitate their work by passing an act which provides for alien registration.

Registration of aliens in the United States is neither a new nor a novel proposition. In 1906 Congress provided by law that each arriving alien be registered and issued a certificate of identification. That law, however, was not enforced until July, 1923. On March 2, 1929, a law was enacted which authorizes the registration of any alien who entered the United States prior to June 3, 1921, if there is no record of his admission for permanent residence. Certificates of identification are issued to all aliens who register under that law. Certificates of registration also are issued for use along the Canadian border. It is apparent, therefore, that Congress already has made some progress toward the enactment of a general registration law.

The principal opposition to registration comes from those who opposed the enactment of our restriction laws. This shows that registration would further strengthen our restriction policy.

During the World War millions of soldiers, sailors, and marines were fingerprinted. The great value of fingerprints as means of positive identification is clearly shown by an Associated Press dispatch, which appeared in the Washington Post. A World War veteran, suffering from a mental disorder incurred during the war, had so completely lost his memory that he could not remember his name, the place where he lived or the names of his relatives. After an absence of 11 years from his home in Chicago, his relatives located him in Philadelphia yesterday and positively identified him by the War Department's record of his fingerprints at time of enlistment.

Registration or enrollment of aliens and the issuance of cards of identification have had the support of many of the Presidents of the United States. President Theodore Roosevelt signed the act of 1906, requiring every alien upon arriving in this country to be registered and issued a certificate of identification.

President Harding said in his annual message to Congress December 8, 1922:

> There are pending bills for the registration of the alien who has come to our shores. I wish the passage of such an act might be expedited. Life amid American opportunities is worth the cost of registration if it is worth the seeking, and the Nation has the right to know who are citizens in the making or who live among us and share our advantages while seeking to undermine our cherished institutions. This provision will enable us to guard against the abuses in immigration, checking the undesirable whose irregular coming is his first violation of our laws. More, it will facilitate the needed Americanizing of those who mean to enroll as fellow citizens.

President Coolidge, when he personally delivered his message to Congress, said:

> American institutions rest solely on good citizenship. They were created by people who had a background of self-government. New arrivals should be limited to our capacity to absorb them into the ranks of good citizenship. America must be kept American. For this purpose it is necessary to continue a policy of restricted immigration. * * * We should find additional safety in a law requiring the immediate registration of all aliens. Those who do not want to be partakers of the American spirit ought not to settle in America.

President Hoover in his annual message to Congress on December 8, 1931, said:

> I recommend that immigration restriction now in force under administrative action be placed upon a more definite basis by law. The deportation laws should be strengthened. Aliens lawfully in the country should be protected by the issuance of a certificate of residence.

If we are to protect American workmen and aliens lawfully in the United States from the competition of the 400,000 or more aliens unlawfully in this country, we must have alien registration. Such registration is no cure-all, but it will dovetail with other remedies being proposed and worked out. It would bring substantial relief to unemployed Americans. Alien registration must come and will come.

DIGEST OF LAWS OF OTHER COUNTRIES ON ALIEN REGISTRATION AND EMPLOYMENT OF FOREIGNERS

GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND

From being primarily designed for purposes of national defense, the aim of registration in Great Britain and northern Ireland has been shifted so that now the chief ends sought are:

First. To relieve the public welfare and penal authorities of the burden of caring for alien paupers or criminals, and Second. To protect the domestic labor market.

All foreign visitors to the United Kingdom who are over 16 years of age, who remain more than 90 days, are required to register immediately upon the expiration of three months from date of arrival.

When a permit has been issued by the Ministry of Labor to enable an alien to enter the United Kingdom for the purpose of employment, a period is always specified and a corresponding time condition is attached to his leave to land by the immigration officer.

Violation or failure to comply with any provisions of the aliens' order is punishable by fine of not more than £100 or imprisonment with or without hard labor for not more than six months.

FRANCE

Alien permits are granted only to aliens when there are no French workers available for the positions offered, and under this system, the control of employment of foreign laborers is effective. The director of public safety in France is given full authority to expel any alien considered undesirable or a menace to the welfare of the country.

It is reported now that very few alien-labor permits are being granted to Americans at the present time, and close watch is constantly kept of all permits. Employers who engage alien workmen without official permits are subject to a fine of 500 to 1,000 francs for each offense, and in addition are likely to be subjected to constant visits from labor inspectors.

From the worker's point of view, the usual penalty for violation of the law is expulsion from the country.

RUMANIA

No institution or industry in Rumania is permitted to employ aliens who are not in possession of a valid permit. All aliens wishing to be employed must be in possession of a permit granted by the ministry of labor.

NORWAY

Aliens seeking employment in Norway are investigated regarding their past record, habits, and character, and if anything of an adverse nature is discovered, the permit is summarily refused. * * * If the police investigation proves satisfactory, the Norwegian employer must conclusively prove that he has made a determined effort to obtain a Norwegian to fill the vacancy, and that his efforts have proved fruitless.

The mere statement of the employer to this effect is not satisfactory. He must exhibit documentary evidence that he has advertised in the local papers for a suitable Norwegian employee, and must furnish the police with the names of the papers in which the advertisement was inserted and describe in detail the results obtained. He must then apply to the employment bureaus in Oslo, Trondheim, and Bergen, as well as to the unemployment bureau of the municipality, and if there is no such organization, to the mayor or county magistrate.

The Norwegian Government has definitely refused to extend the working permit of one American citizen employed by a local subsidiary of a large British corporation as manager of its local branch on the grounds that there are unemployed Norwegians capable of filling the post.

DENMARK

According to Danish law, any alien resides in Denmark on condition of a permission for a limited time granted by the police authorities, which may be revoked at any time under the law of 1930.

SWITZERLAND

The chief purpose of the Swiss system, after the control of undesirable persons, is the regulation of employment of foreigners, and to prevent their taking work and filling positions which might be given to qualified unemployed Swiss. * * * There is close cooperation between the registration authorities and the labor offices.

BELGIUM

Special regulations of inhibitory effect are in force at the present time with respect to aliens who attempt to enter Belgium for the purpose of seeking work, and in this connection the Ministry of Labor is consulted in each case which may seem to include a purpose on the part of an alien to accept employment under contract previously made or to seek work after arrival.

ALBANIA

Article I of the decree law, dated May 18, 1931, reads: "Beginning on the date of the promulgation of this decree law, the entry of any foreign laborer in territory of the Albanian Republic shall be prohibited." Article II provides: "No foreign laborer, whatever his nationality and the purpose of his journey, shall be admitted to Albania."

FINLAND

Due to the limited economic resources of Finland, the entry of persons seeking remunerative occupations is discouraged; and now, indeed, cabaret artists, musicians, and others in this general class are no longer issued permits to reside in this country if seeking to gain their livelihood there.

SWEDEN

If an alien in Sweden wishes to remain in the country, or to take employment, he must file application with the county board or with the police authorities.

YUGOSLAVIA

Residence in a given place in Yugoslavia must be reported to the local police authorities. * * * If visitors desire to remain for an extended period, they must apply for a permit of sojourn. If they wish to take employment, they must have the employment permit issued by the Labor Inspection Office or by the Ministry of Social Politics and Public Health.

POLAND

Aliens resident in Poland are subject to two systems of registration:

First. * * * The obligation of all foreigners desiring to remain in Poland for a period of three months or more to execute a foreigner's registration declaration within eight days after their arrival in the country, and Second. * * * The obligation to comply with the rules and regulations concerning a change of address.

GERMANY

All persons who take up permanent residence in Germany are required to register with the police authorities of their district. Failure to conform to this regulation is punishable by a fine or imprisonment.

ITALY

Registration of aliens in Italy has been compulsory in one form or another since the unification of the kingdom, the details of which are incorporated in the law dated June 18, 1931, relating to public safety.

Not only is registration compulsory but the responsibility for compliance with the law and the penalty for failure to do so are placed on the alien, on the employer, and on the person who receives the worker in his home or rents him living quarters or who leases or sells lodging or property to him.

The provisions for deporting persons who have failed to comply with the law regarding registration supply a simple means of ridding the country of undesirable aliens.

LITHUANIA

Aliens must pay $0.50 a month for permits to reside in Lithuania; an equal fee is paid by each member of the family over 16 years of age.

TURKEY

All foreigners in Turkey are required to register with the police authorities within 15 days of their arrival.

BULGARIA

All laborers and specialists who wish to obtain employment must present permission permits from the ministry of commerce; professional artists must have permission from the ministry of education.

LATVIA

Every person residing in Latvia has to be registered with the police authorities of his place of residence. * * * Any foreigner who wishes to remain for a period longer than indicated in his visa must procure from the ministry of the interior a special permit. * * * These permits are issued for a period not exceeding one year.

POLAND

Permission may be refused to foreigners to enter, remain, or pass in transit in Poland if the foreigner can not show that he has means of support in the Republic of Poland * * *. Foreigners can obtain permission to stay only through the medium of Polish consular offices prior to their arrival in Poland.

HUNGARY

All aliens must be registered with the local police authorities in Hungary within 24 hours of their arrival.

AUSTRIA

All persons, whether residing temporarily or permanently in Austria, are subject to the law on registration in Austria.

SPAIN

Registration of aliens in Spain is provided for under a law which further requires that destitute and indigent aliens be taken before their consuls and, if refused aid, they will be compelled to work under surveillance.

ESTONIA

The system of registration now in force in Estonia is based upon regulations enacted by the state assembly under date of July 11, 1930. At the present time German nationals are the only foreigners who are not obliged to pay sojourn fees in Estonia.

GREECE

Aliens over 16 years of age intending to reside permanently in Greece must at least one month before the expiration of their permit submit a petition to the service of foreigners, and, in the absence of such service, to the police authorities of their place of residence.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

All arrivals and departures of aliens in this country are required to be registered with the police authorities.

SOUTHERN RHODESIA

All aliens are required in Southern Rhodesia to sign a declaration concerning their origin, past, and intended movements, and in certain instances there are inquiries concerning their character.

NETHERLANDS

There is no registration as such of aliens in the Netherlands.

CANADA

The only registration of aliens in Canada is registration for resident Chinese.

NEW ZEALAND

In 1917 an act of Parliament was passed providing for the registration of all aliens. This act and other later acts were suspended on August 20, 1923, until revived by the governor general by a proclamation approved in executive council.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, in the last two days there has been a lot of politics discussed, one side criticizing the President of the United States and the other side criticizing the Democratic majority in the House of Representatives.

Anybody with a grain of sense knows that neither the President of the United States nor the Democratic majority of the House has got one thing to do with the general depression in this country. The general depression in this country is world-wide, due entirely to the aftermath of the World War. We are living in an age when prices in London, prices in Paris, prices in Berlin, even prices in Shanghai and Tokyo are reflected in our prices. Prices there to-day are reflected in our prices to-morrow. We are not living in an isolated age like 100 years ago, in the days of sailing vessels. This depression is world-wide.

The President has been severely criticized for saying that prosperity was just around the corner. Let me ask the membership of this House how many of you thought last summer that we had reached the bottom, and have paid for it with your real good hard dollars? Many of us have.

Mr. HART. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield.

Mr. HART. Does the gentleman know what the price of wheat is in Germany and France to-day?

Mr. PARKER of New York. No; I do not.

Mr. HART. It is $1.65; and there is no depression in agriculture over there.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Very well. But still the price over there is reflected here to-morrow. The price is not made there. It is made in Liverpool, as the gentleman knows, and the price is based on transportation, tariff, and other facts in the equation.

But it seems to me as Members of Congress we have a duty imposed upon us very much greater than to stand here and bicker with each other about political questions—minor political questions. It seems to me the thing for us to do is to get together and reduce the cost of government and raise taxes and balance the Budget. Then after that, if we want to make a political fight, let us have it, but let us do the patriotic, honest thing first.

Mr. YON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield.

Mr. YON. What would the gentleman suggest in the way of reducing Government expenses?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I will refer that question to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE], who has had very much more experience along those lines than I have had. I have made no particular study of it and I do not pretend to know.

Mr. YON. The gentleman has been a Member of Congress for quite a number of years.

Mr. PARKER of New York. I grant the gentleman that, but I have not been on the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. YON. The gentleman has had something to do with the spending of money.

Mr. PARKER of New York. As the gentleman well knows, a Member of Congress pays most of his attention to affairs which come before the committee of which he is a member. He can not give particular attention to other matters. He must follow the committee who have considered the bill. I will leave the answer to the gentleman from Alabama, who has given the question most careful consideration.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I have not a cure-all, of course, neither did the Economy Committee have a perfect cure.

Mr. PARKER of New York. I did not say that, nor did I criticize the committee.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I want to compliment the gentleman on his suggestion that we must get together. It was unfortunate that politics was injected into this thing at this particular time. I wish to say to the gentleman that it seems to me his President took the lead in that regard; that his President caught the psychology of this country; that his President knew the leadership in this House on both sides has urged the balancing of the Budget, and they have urged the Economy Committee program. I am talking about the Speaker of this House, the majority leader on my side, the gentleman himself, and the leaders on his side. They have urged both of those programs. The thing I am troubled about and the thing I can not quite agree with the gentlement upon is that he assumes that his President has committed no sin when he undertook to inject politics into this question at a particularly inopportune time.

Mr. PARKER of New York. In answer to the gentleman from Alabama I wish to say that his answer proves exactly the point I tried to make, that until we leave out politics we will never get anywhere, be it from this side of the House or that side. We have got to come here and deal with this question as statesmen and as patriots, not as politicians. I did not get up to accuse anybody. I simply got up to plead with the House to consider this question as it would any business proposition. We should try to get into a condition where the Budget will be balanced, because, gentleman, no business can run in the red all the time, not even the Federal Government.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I entirely agree with the gentleman.

Mr. PARKER of New York. And until we can get away from the political aspect and until we can forget that, at least for the time being, I think it will be very deplorable for the whole country.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. We have heard that confidence is the thing that is needed. We have just had a message brought to us that confidence is the thing that is most needed. Could the gentleman tell me anything that would tend more toward the disturbance of confidence than this blast which the President has made against the integrity and intelligence of the House of Representatives?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Gentlemen, I started out not to get into any political argument, and I refuse to be drawn into one.

Mrs. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mrs. ROGERS. Does not the gentleman think it would be extremely helpful if we taught the children in our schools in America to budget, to realize the value of a dollar, and how to spend that dollar? We would then have a Nation of budget-minded people if money management, how to spend, and where to save were taught in every school in the land. Then when people wrote to us they would realize some of our problems and would understand our problems and would make intelligent suggestions to us.

Mr. PARKER of New York. I will answer the lady from Massachusetts by saying that it would be very much better if we did not stop with the children but went right on to the adults.

Mrs. ROGERS. Exactly, but if you teach the children they always take it home to their parents, and we would have a budget-minded Nation, and when the children grow up and become Members of Congress, they will know how to balance the Federal Budget.

Mr. PARKER of New York. In conclusion, as I said before, many of us guessed wrong on the duration of this depression. I can tell you of an instance. I know a man who borrowed a sum of money. He put up over 200 per cent of collateral. He has paid $10,000 in money and put up $13,000 more in collateral. That happened last August. Very many of the securities of the country have dropped 50 per cent. They have dropped clear below their value. It is our fault, and when I say our fault I assume as much responsibility as those on the Democratic side. It is our fault that we do not get together and consider this question in a businesslike way, cut general expenses, and raise the money with which to balance the Budget.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Anyone speaking from a high official position should be fair enough to at least remember that since the budget system has been in force the House, acting in a nonpartisan way through its Appropriations Committee, has at every session made substantial reductions in departmental budget estimates submitted by the President, and any official who undertakes to write an economy message to the American people should never overlook that fact if he wishes to be fair to the Members of the House and its Appropriations Committee.

Mr. PARKER of New York. As I have said, I refuse to be drawn into a political controversy.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FULLER].

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, the President's recent message to Congress demands high taxes to take care of the deficit caused by Republican misrule. After what this Democratic House has done at his instance it shows ingratitude, cheap politics, absolutely void of statesmanship. Evidently some one has told him to abuse Congress to detract attention from the miserable failure of his administration.

Congress is accused of a lack of courage but, as a matter of fact, it, like the people of this country, lacks confidence in any measure which the President recommends. When the people of this country begin paying these unwarranted and exorbitant taxes they will fully realize the tribute they are paying due to the reign of "King Herbert." Each and every dollar of this extra billion-dollar tax will be paid to balance the billion-dollar deficit created this session at President Hoover's command. His spokesman at the other end of this Capitol Building claims that this Nation needs a Mussolini. No doubt he speaks the sentiment of the most expensive Executive this Government has ever known, and would be pleased to gratify the ambition of President Hoover by conferring upon him the authority of a dictator, the authority of a Mussolini.

The House is chastised for passing a bill appropriating $132,000,000 for the building of good roads, to give employment to the unemployed, and at the same time leave a monument in every county in the Nation. When the Democratic House asks for its favorable consideration it is claimed by the President as a raid on the Treasury. But when he demands and obtains billions for big business he and his Wall Street controlled newspapers call it statesmanship. In his first message to Congress this session, at a time when 8,000,000 people were out of employment, he offered no measure of relief, no appropriation to take care of the hungry and poor or to give them employment, but in his kingly way guaranteed that no man would starve during the winter. The guaranty could only be backed by the local community in which the poor, hungry, and unemployed resided.

This panic has been in existence for three years. Why did not the Republicans while in power set up an economic program and stop unwarranted and unnecessary expenditures? Why did not the President send a message to Congress when the House was controlled by over a hundred majority of his political faith? Not until after it was definitely known that the Democrats would control the House did the President or any of his Cabinet members let the deficit of this country become known or ask for a balanced Budget. Had the Republicans controlled this House there would have been no effort made to balance the Budget.

No one can truthfully claim this deficit is due other than to Republican administration. A few days ago the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER], referring to our financial debacle, said, "Rome was on fire." I sought an opportunity to ask him who started the fire. No smoke was discovered and no fire was visible until after the passage of the Smoot-Hawley tariff law. The President asked Congress for a limited revision of the tariff laws, but did not have the courage, which he accuses Congress of lacking, to veto this bill when he knew that a thousand economists were denouncing it, when he knew that it was a 20 per cent increase over the existing law, and when he should have known that it would kill our foreign commerce, bankrupt industry, and bring on this panic.

In retaliation the nations of the world erected similar tariff walls against America. Our import duties and exports have reached the bottom, industries became idle, and business bankrupt; 8,000,000 men were thrown out of employment; banks failed, and thus the panic.

The administration did nothing except to acquiesce in the other two causes: The wicked conduct of our international bankers in selling to Americans seventeen billions of worthless obligations of foreign nations, and the conduct of the stock-exchange brokers in cleaning up and ruining the stock and bond market. The American people believed in our President when he said stocks and bonds could not go too high; that prosperity was guaranteed and poverty was banished. The people fell for the statements; the brokers used the argument to sell inflated and worthless stock, and then the crash.

It is true Europe is financially impoverished, but Europe is not the cause of our panic. France is most prosperous, notwithstanding the loss and ravages of the World War, fought mostly on her soil.

Every measure and commission the President has demanded at the hands of Congress has either been a joke and a farce or wholly in the interest of big business. What he wants now is a sales tax in order that he can levy a tribute upon the middle and poor class of this country to take care of a deficit caused by lack of leadership and foresight. His Wickersham Prohibition Commission, created for the purpose of passing the buck and avoiding responsibilities, cost this Government $500,000 and it made no finding other than those well known to the people of this country. The Farm Board, created by the Republican Congress and at his request, carried out a political obligation and has cost the taxpayers $400,000,000 and accomplished nothing. Why did not he practice economy with this board and see to it that employees were not permitted to draw $50,000 and $75,000 a year as salaries?

The moratorium was granted at his request, due to the fact he had committed Members of Congress by telegrams at a time when they were not informed of the deficit in the Public Treasury and relied upon his judgment, which has proven to be bad. As a result Europe was given an extension for the $252,000,000 past due, at a time when they had the money and could and would have paid except for the action of the President. This huge amount has been passed into the deficit, and a tax is to be levied upon the American people to pay it. I will always be proud that I voted against this measure, as I did against the Federal farm-land bank appropriation of $125,000,000 demanded by the President. This amount must now be collected in taxes from the American people. The people of the country have received no benefit from this act. It was simply passed for the purpose of increasing the selling value of outstanding bonds of these banks. These banks have not granted extensions to farmers, who are behind with their payments, but are proceeding systematically to foreclose the farm mortgages.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation, carrying an appropriation of $500,000,000, was another measure wholly and entirely in the interest of big business, and this amount must now be collected from the people. We were assured by the President that this money would not be loaned to big business, as they were able to take care of themselves, but we find that under the administration of this law big business is first to be taken care of.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. No; I can not yield. If the gentleman will give me more time, I shall yield.

Mr. BARBOUR. I will give the gentleman one minute if the gentleman will yield.

Mr. FULLER. All right; I yield.

Mr. BARBOUR. Why were those appropriations during the administration of Herbert Hoover, as the gentleman says, carried at the figures that they were? I will answer the question if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. FULLER. All right.

Mr. BARBOUR. They came by reason of the fact that when those appropriations were before the House of Representatives, Members on both sides of the aisle, Democrats and Republicans, raided the appropriation bills time and again and added moneys to the appropriations.

Mr. FULLER. I am not talking about the appropriations for the various departments. I am talking, for instance, about the measure that was passed here for a moratorium that took a burden off of Europe of $250,000,000 and placed it upon the American people. I am talking about your Reconstruction Finance Corporation measure.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] would be put to great embarrassment if the gentleman from Arkansas should ask him to point to all appropriations which this House has recklessly added to appropriation bills reported by the Committee on Appropriations. If the gentleman from California will read the statements made by two former chairmen of the Committee on Appropriations, namely, Mr. Madden and Mr. WOOD, in which they have listed the reductions made by the Committee on Appropriations and approved by the House, the gentleman would be still further embarrassed by the very general question he has just propounded to the gentleman who now has the floor.

Mr. HART. If the gentleman will permit, let me add another suggestion. The assistant minority leader on this side and the spokesman for Mr. Hoover in the Senate have now asked for another $100,000,000 for the Farm Board.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. FULLER. I yield.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Did I understand the gentleman to say that this is not a world-wide depression?

Mr. FULLER. No; I did not say that. I said that so far as our financial condition in America is concerned, it was not caused by the depression over the entire world. France is in fine shape to-day. She has more money per capita than the United States, even though just a few years ago her land was destroyed where battles had been fought upon her soil. France has money and is in good condition. Her agriculture is in fine shape. Wheat is selling there for $1.65 a bushel, while in the United States it is selling for 40 cents a bushel. Why? Because of the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill, which set up a barrier against France and therefore they only allow us a certain quota, and we can not get in there with our products.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER. I yield.

Mr. GLOVER. Was there anything in the message which the President sent to Congress at the beginning of Congress indicating that there was to be a deficit, or has there been anything about an unbalanced Budget until after $252,000,000 for the moratorium, $500,000,000 for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, $125,000,000 for the Federal land banks, and $125,000,000 for the Steagall-Glass bill, making $1,200,000,000, and then the cry went up to balance the Budget?

Mr. FULLER. No; it has run along for years without any suggestion of balancing the Budget.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

The President recommended to Congress withholding appropriations for vocational education. His policy is to appropriate millions for big business at home and millions for Europe, but not one cent for agriculture and the distressed and poor of this country.

Under the present law Congress is appropriating $8,000,000 a year for vocational education, which is distributed to the States and Territories, of which amount my State received approximately $160,000 a year. Soon after the enactment of the Smith-Hughes Vocational Education Act farming communities all over the Nation took advantage of this law, and in many instances they have built new schoolhouses, enlarged the old one, and installed special equipment for this work at the expense of $1,500 to $5,000 in each school. In many instances smaller districts have been abolished and added to the vocational school, and practically all of the districts, by reason of this course, have large outstanding mortgages. It was contemplated that this policy of assistance from the Government should be permanent and not be withdrawn. A failure to comply with this obligation would be a breach of good faith and bring ruin to these schools. It is not fair to say that the districts and the States should finance these schools. The Government induced them to embark upon this new venture. The States and special school districts are in a worse financial condition than the Federal Government.

It is false economy to endeavor to save money for the Government at the sacrifice and expense of the farm boys and girls of this Nation. In every farming community 4-H Clubs have been organized, and in my State there are over 35,000 members. For the last two years an Arkansas boy has won first honors as the best farmer belonging to these clubs. We can no longer farm as our fathers. Competition is great and farm products are selling for less than the cost of production. The successful growing and marketing of grain, hogs, and cattle require education and the exercise of better judgment than in former days. Farm soils need treatment, fruits and berries need special care and attention due to insects, pests, and parasites.

We can not hope to prosper as a Nation unless we begin at the bottom and build up. Farming is the basic and greatest industry in this Nation. America can never be prosperous until the farming industry can yield fair returns. We can not hope to collect money and pay into the Treasury sufficient funds to operate the Government unless we build up and maintain the farming industry. When the farmer prospers the Nation and everyone in it prosper. When the farmers suffer from drought and panic and are unable to make a decent living and pay their obligations all other business suffers. No more profitable investment was ever made than the money invested in vocational education. Unless we educate the boys and girls of the farm upon the best methods of farming, we can not hope to retain them on the farm, and to do this we must give them some of the same privileges, opportunities, and advantages their friends in the cities enjoy. By reason of their education and interest in vocational training they are instilled with the virtues of farm life and the real benefits to be received. It will do more to keep them on the farms and out of the cities among the unemployed than any other measure. We should bear in mind the student of the present is the governing influence of the future, and the tendency of the present mind promises fundamental changes in the very structure of our Government.

Now the House is chastised for its failure to accept the President's advice and withhold this small amount of money from the farmer and his family.

SALARY REDUCTION

I fully agree that economy should be practiced, and as the record shows, I voted for practically every economic measure submitted by the Economy Committee. The time has come when the people of this country are justly demanding economy in every branch of government. The time has come when bureaus and useless commissions should be abolished, all overlapping agencies should be eliminated, and when public officials should take a cut in salary. The Government is now losing $5,000 a minute and over $7,000,000 a day by reason of its income not equalizing its disbursements. I supported the measure providing for a 11 per cent reduction in salaries after an allowance of a $1,000 exemption. I voted against the exemption of $2,500. This measure would have amounted to a saving of $67,000,000, and reduced Congressmen's salaries, together with other reductions in the program, much over $1,000 a year. This meant where one drew a salary of $1,800 a year that he would suffer a reduction of $88. This plan is much preferable to the furlough plan offered by President Hoover. To me it means more saving and at the same time less hardship to the employee. Under the President's plan one drawing $1,800 a year would be required to take 30 days' vacation without pay, which would be a reduction of $150; but inasmuch as that vacancy would have to be filled by some one else, I can not figure out the savings as claimed for the plan. Certainly, the rural mail carrier would suffer much more under the Hoover furlough plan. I am opposed to cheap labor and am opposed to a reduction in salaries of the lower-paid employees of the Government, and in most instances in the smaller communities the Government employees are not overpaid. They render most efficient and courteous service. But since it is evident that economy must be practiced and salaries cut, the committee's proposal is more economical and at the same time better for the employees. All of us have received petitions and letters in great number from our districts protesting against reduction in salaries. Since the Government employees have felt the effects of the panic less than anyone else, and the cost of living has been reduced 30 per cent in the last two years, I feel they should uncomplainingly accept a cut and be patriotic enough to help out in these trying times. Those in my district will join with me in this sentiment.

Most of the protest is due to the propaganda instigated by the representatives of the various groups here in Washington, heads and directors of the various bureaus, and through their representatives. If the President is so strong for economy, why does he not straighten out and curb the influence of the membership of his own political house? Those working in the departments and bureaus in Washington are allowed 30 days' vacation and 30 days more in case of sickness, and many of them manage to take advantage of both. They work only seven hours a day and are granted half holidays on Saturday. At the expiration of 30 years they are retired on good pay, the Government contributing approximately $25,000,000 for this purpose. Those in the service outside of Washington are not granted these same privileges, and by reason of the demands upon Congress and the favors granted it works a hardship and injustice upon most of those outside of Washington, and causes criticism of these employees in the communities in which they live.

The purpose of the President's message is to chastise Congress for failing to do the things that he does not do himself; a failure to balance the Budget, when the President is unable to point out specific instances, and the few recommendations that he has made are even ignored by a majority of the Republican Members. The Democrats are not accountable for this panic nor for this deficit, neither are they accountable for the lack of confidence in the Republican administration.

A few days ago it was reported that the Committee on Banking and Currency had unanimously reported the Goldsborough measure which would increase commodity prices. This measure passed by an overwhelming vote, and no criticism was heard from the White House. Yesterday the daily papers carried a big picture of J. Pierpont Morgan with an account that he was a guest at the White House discussing financial matters with the President. Immediately following his visit the President condemns the Goldsborough bill. Is Congress going to enact laws and run this Government, or are we going to intrust it to the Morgans and to Wall Street? It is true the people of the Nation lack confidence, and they will continue to lack confidence just as long as Ogden Mills and Morgan, as representatives of Wall Street, dominate, and just as long as the Hoover Republican administration remains in power. [Applause.]

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am in entire accord with the views expressed by my colleague from New York [Mr. PARKER]. I think this is the time to pour oil on the troubled waters. We are in the midst of the greatest national emergency that this country has ever seen, affecting the happiness and security of the American people far more seriously than the World War, and I hope that Democrats and Republicans in this House at least will try to cooperate for the national welfare and put partisanship aside until we have balanced the Budget, and have adopted the necessary legislation that is required in this economic crisis. We Members of Congress are not blind to the deplorable economic conditions of the country and to the suffering and privations of 8,000,000 unemployed. It is far more important than the welfare of the Republican Party on the one hand or the Democratic Party on the other. It is a national issue affecting the interests and lives of 125,000,000 American people, which is above and beyond mere partisanship. The only way that we can restore confidence and even a small degree of prosperity is by balancing the Budget, and we ought to send out word from the Democratic leaders on one side and the Republican leaders on the other that we propose to stay in session until the Budget is balanced, and amply balanced. I for one, after 12 years' service in the House, have the utmost confidence in the desire for the public welfare by both the majority and the minority and in the honesty, intelligence, and patriotism of all of the Members of the House, and in their capacity and ability to legislate and to balance the Budget in one way or another, either through new taxes or through economy; but the word should go out and it should go out immediately to the American people that we will not adjourn until the Budget is balanced.

I am calling on the leaders of both the Democratic and the Republican parties to send that word out to the people back home and then to combine both parties in defense of the honor and fair name of the House of Representatives and its rights and prerogatives, and above all, of its ability to control and pass legislation for the welfare of all of the people of the United States.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Who raises any question that the Budget is not going to be balanced except the Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the United States?

Mr. FISH. My reason for rising to-day is to pay my respects to certain large New York newspapers, controlled by the big interests, that have viciously and maliciously sought to undermine our representative system of government, and particularly the House of Representatives, by publishing editorials that are false, malicious, and absolutely contrary to the fact. Nothing is more needed at this time than confidence and faith in our country and in our republican form of government and in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman has referred to certain editorials. They followed the message of the President of the United States.

Mr. FISH. No; I differ with the gentleman. These editorials to which I refer preceded the statement by the President, but I do not propose to discuss that question now within my limited time. That will be discussed by a great many Members on both sides of the House. I think I am more familiar perhaps than any other Member of the House with the propaganda and activities of the communists in the United States. I know what the communists, the socialists, the pink intellectuals, the radical college professors, and other visionaries are trying to do. They are seeking to break down the belief and faith of the American people in both their economic and political systems, and above all in our republican form of government, and I hate to say that the ultra conservative New York newspaper editorial writers join in and lead the way, holding up Republicans and Democrats in this House as traitors to our Government and to our country, to such an extent that the people back in New York are utterly muddled as to the issues and confused by unfair, misleading, and false editorials.

Let me read a brief letter which I received to-day, addressed to me by a woman from New York who has been completely confused by certain editorials in a New York City newspaper:

DEAR SIR: Treason is the word used by one of our great New York dailies for the act of those in our national councils who voted for the iniquitous bonus bill, just passed. We have, unfortunately, no punishment in time of peace for this terrible crime, but perhaps next election when our so-called representatives need the vote of those who have the interest of our beloved country at heart they will find that the people know by whom they have been betrayed.

This unfortunate woman who has written me believes that the bonus bill has been adopted by the House of Representatives. She evidently meant to refer to the so-called pension bill. I do not know whether she is a constituent of mine or not; I hope not, because my constituents are somewhat more intelligent. Why are these people misinformed? Because they read these inspired and vicious and untruthful editorials. Here is one from the Evening Post, of New York, and that paper, although limited in circulation and catering to special privilege, is by far the worst offender. As a matter of fact, that is the only newspaper that I am referring to. I exonerate Mr. Curtis, the owner. He does not know anything about these editorials, but he ought to select more competent and trustworthy editorial writers. Here is an editorial headed "Stop Spending Our Money."

Then it goes on to show that $150,000,000 of the people's money has been appropriated for the widows and orphans, giving the people to understand that the House appropriated $150,000,000 annually for pensions for the widows and orphans, which, of course, is not the case but over a long period of years. That is what causes the misunderstandings, the bitterness, and the lack of faith in Congress. This is not the first offense of this newspaper. Its editorials are often yellower than any other newspaper in the country, more contemptible and more false, although it claims to be the most conservative in the United States. It is the same paper that called Speaker GARNER muddle-headed a few weeks ago in another abusive editorial. It is the same paper that referred to the congressional report on the activities of communists as un-American and cowardly. I said at that time, and repeat now, that the editor or the subeditor who wrote that editorial, who says that deportation of these alien communists is cowardly and un-American, is either a coward or a liar.

This is not the first time the New York Evening Post has published malicious and false editorials, and when it charges nine-tenths of Members of the House with being traitors it is merely adhering to its editorial policy of personalities and abuse.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from New York two additional minutes.

Mr. YON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. YON. Did this same newspaper back in 1928 and 1929 warn the people of the United States of the possible climax that was approaching when they were interested in speculations that brought this ruin?

Mr. FISH. I imagine not; it caters to Wall Street. I shall conclude, Mr. Chairman, simply by saying that this conservative newspaper is doing a great disservice to the American people by its vicious attacks upon the Congress of the United States and by undermining the faith of the American people in the honesty and integrity of both Republican and Democratic Members of the House as if we were traitors to the Nation. It is such treasonable editorials that cause the public to lose faith in our republican form of government and to turn to communism of fascism. This is the time for Republicans and Democrats alike to combine, not only to balance the Budget but in defense of the honor and integrity of the House of Representatives against these vile and malicious and untruthful attacks. [Applause.]

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. LOZIER. The gentleman, of course, well knows that the old régime of editors, when we had great editors, is past; the days when we had such men as Dana and Greeley, and Joseph Medill, and the other great editorial writers.

Mr. FISH. Most unfortunately, yes.

Mr. LOZIER. At that time there was no connection between the editorial room and the counting house, but at the present time there is absolutely no independent action as far as the editorial staff is concerned. They take orders from the counting house, and as a result we have no independent editorial thought in America. There is not a great editor in America at the present time, because all of them are under the influence of the business department of these great newspapers.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman probably is correct, as far as that is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT].

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to take a few minutes to speak on the subject which is the underlying cause of all our troubles—farm relief. I know that farm relief as a subject is somewhat as Mark Twain said about the weather, something about which we all talk but nobody seems to do anything about it. In fact, in this Congress "farm relief" and "balancing the Budget" have become so trite that they dispel rather than invite interest.

I speak not only as the Representative of an agricultural district, I speak not only as the friend of the farmers and the tobacco growers, but as one of them. I speak as a tobacco grower who last year did not receive enough for his crop to repay what he had advanced tenants in order to live while the crop was produced.

On yesterday the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] went into the matter of farm relief in a most able and fundamental way. I hope, in the few minutes I have, in my feeble way, to enlarge upon what the gentleman from Texas said. I invite a careful reading of the gentleman's remarks by all who are sincerely the friend of the farmer. The farm relief that we get in this Congress is not worthy of the name.

I see the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MCDUFFIE] before me. I want to say that I supported the gentleman's economy program in every one of its proposals. I would have gone much farther had I the chance. I know that the country is clamoring for economies in Government, but, after all, that is negative. Agriculture can not be relieved in that way or any other negative way alone. The cure must be more radical and fundamental. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] yesterday explained how through the years agriculture had been strangled by our American industrial system. The condition that agriculture is in to-day is not due to the depression. Agriculture was paralyzed before the depression came. Industry in greed and folly first paralyzed agriculture and then in turn is being paralyzed by the havoc it has wrought.

The trouble with agriculture is so serious that it will not recover or be alleviated by the temporary and superficial remedies suggested. It is not the depression now or any temporary result of world-wide conditions. Agriculture was paralyzed before the depression set in. It will not be relieved until that system of American Government giving artificial stimulus through tariffs and subsidy to industry is discontinued. This relief will probably not be realized so long as this continues to be a Government dictated and controlled by organized minorities; possibly it may never be realized. It has been the history of the world that the tiller of the soil has in all ages gradually become unimportant and uninfluential in the government. In Europe he is a peasant, elsewhere a peon, and in this country he has gradually for a generation been following the course history seems destined for him to follow. Even here his representatives, when loyal and courageous to his interests, are gradually losing their power. Year by year their number in legislative assemblies grows smaller. When reapportionment dictates that a district is to be lost, the country counties are divided and tacked on to some city, and now in legislative halls the representatives of rural districts are in small minority. These representatives on the floors of Congress express sympathy for his plight and are sincere, yet better-organized and more influential groups prevent him from that character of relief which can alone restore him to his position of equality among the industries of the country.

The other day we saw inserted in a revenue bill a tariff on oil. The farmers' oil and gasoline will now cost him a little more. The oil men were here; they have besieged Congress for this relief with letters and pamphlets and interviews. They were prepared to oppose in the Congressman's district his reelection. This particular item alone did not hurt the farmer a great deal, yet when one after another of similar benefits is given to industry, all of which the farmer must pay, and never receive in return a reward, and this goes on through the years, the farmer is doomed to peasantry.

We have seen in the present administration a Congress called in special session for the benefit of agriculture, and we have seen that Congress only add to the farmers' already unbearable burdens; pursued by powerful industrial lobbies they raised the price on everything the farmer must buy, and in return gave him either in folly or deceit the same kind of tariff bounties when it was obvious that this same kind of remedy had driven him to bankruptcy because the tariffs to industry he had to pay and the tariff to him he received not. They gave him a tariff of 42 cents on wheat, and wheat sells for less than 42 cents, and yet that was given him in exchange for a tariff on wire fencing which he had to pay in full.

Let me read the observations of one not interested in American politics, an unprejudiced observer. I read from a Tokyo newspaper, the Japan Advertiser:

> It is not difficult to see, in part at least, why economic conditions have operated against the farmer. In so far as protection has accelerated the development of industrial America it has done so at the expense of agriculture. For protection could not protect the farmer. The things which he had to sell were things of which, until yesterday, America had a surplus; he had to sell them at the world price. But everything which he had to buy—not merely his clothes and cutlery, but his machinery, wagons, harness, railway freights—he bought at the protected price. No industry could stand this generation after generation.
> Those marvelously rich cities with their incredibly luxurious hotels and railroad stations that are superpalaces have grown up in some measure at the expense of rural America; the town has bled the country.

That is the truth. It may be a desirable condition, but I do not think so. It may be thought by some to be preferable to have an industrial rather than a rural civilization. Again I do not think so.

It is an old story that you have heard about what the tariff has done to the farmer, but it is a true one. I would say to those who deny it, "Go to the rural sections and look at the pictures and see what has happened to agriculture since we began this tariff-fed industrial policy." In my own district is the magnificent home of Cassius M. Clay, deceased, White Hall. Clay was minister to Russia. His home was famous all over the land for its hospitality, its refinement, and luxury. I say to you that this afternoon the great halls of that mansion in the bluegrass of Kentucky are filled with hay.

The farm relief we get here is so incidental and superficial as to be of little effect. When we were discussing the revenue bill one gentleman made an eloquent plea for the removal of taxes on power that is used on the farm for the benefit of the farmer. I wrote the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee suggesting that by adding to taxes on manufactured tobacco and cigarettes they could get large revenue from the great tobacco companies of this country and relieve the farmer from some of his tax bill, and then exempt all manufactured tobacco from taxation up to 100,000 pounds. This would enable small local tobacco companies to compete and restore the little factories that have been crushed out of existence. This would have added revenue to the bill and aided at the same time the farmer and small factory. It could not be done because industry continually holds out to agriculture the bait that if you relieve us of our burdens it will indirectly benefit you. Sincere friends of the farmer are persuaded to become the cat's-paw of industry. Let us see if relieving the tobacco companies has resulted in benefits passing on to the farmer.

No; this depression has not been general. The American Tobacco Co. made last year more than $45,000,000. It had its biggest year. See their report of March 18, 1932. When it made its manufactured products out of tobacco last year it made them out of the cheapest crop it had bought up to that date. It was at that time assured of the best and biggest crop ever grown, yet I say to you that at the same time it raised the price of its manufactured tobacco to the consumer and lowered the price it paid to the producers.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. GILBERT. After padding its overhead and paying a 10 per cent dividend on its common stock, rather than to give the farmer a decent price for his tobacco, it paid a bonus to its president of approximately $1,000,000. Yet they took from me tobacco at 2 and 3 cents a pound.

If you will take the tobacco in a package of Old Gold cigarettes and weight it, you will find it weighs five-eighths of 1 ounce.

If you will calculate it, you will see that the price of that tobacco sold to the consumer is $3.85 a pound. So in the year 1931 they sold to me tobacco at $3.85 a pound that they bought from me the previous year for less than 10 cents a pound.

I have had a resolution pending since Congress began asking to be permitted to bring these facts before the Congress and the country, but I have received little sympathetic consideration. Any man who goes on the tobacco breaks, if he knows anything about tobacco, can see a plan in execution which absolutely fixes the price of every pound exposed for sale. One great company will buy a certain grade of tobacco and pay a certain price for it, and the other companies will refrain from bidding on that grade of tobacco. Another company will buy on another day. There is a concerted action obvious on its face. We have tried in vain to have some prosecutions and some investigations made by the Department of Justice.

I speak for the tobacco growers of the United States, of whom I am proud to be one. We have no protection. We have no sympathy, and I repeat that they are every year robbing the tobacco grower of his crop.

I say to this House that the profits of the great tobacco companies of this country have gradually increased for 10 years, and I have the figures before me, until they reached their greatest year last year, the year they paid starvation prices to the growers.

But to return to the general farm condition, let me say in conclusion that last year, in early June, before the freshness of spring had given way to summer and the country in this climate was at its prettiest, I had occasion to travel the side roads in Virginia and Kentucky. Here, in times now gone forever, dwelt a people who loved the country. Here were the homesteads, from which came the influence that controlled the affairs of state. Here dwelt a people educated and refined, who delighted in the virtues, the simplicity, and strength of rural life.

Dotted along the highways stood the old colonial homes, out of repair, neglected, and forsaken. In reverie I could recall the scenes of former prestige, prosperity, and happiness; the big rooms and halls lighted, food aplenty, music and laughter as the boys and girls were welcomed home from college. There were flowers in the garden and along the walks, herds grazed upon the hill, squirrels frisked on great poplars, and colts frolicked in the waving bluegrass.

Such was the state of country life two generations ago. This was in the day when Jeffersonian principles of government—equal rights to all, special privileges to none—were believed in and administered. The Democratic Party had conducted the affairs of the Nation, without exception, since the days of Jefferson. No one industry or class was permitted to exploit any other industry. No panic ever happened under a low tariff.

In my reverie I could see cultured women coming from these farms to adorn the highest places in our social life. I could see the men from them filling the highest offices in the county, the State, and the Nation. In those days men like Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Jackson came from the farms to become President of the United States.

Then a new party came into power by reason of the war. Though its first President taught of a government "of the people, by the people, and for the people," that party soon forgot the people as a whole. It inaugurated policies of special privilege. It sought to build up the manufacturer at the expense of the grower. It passed high tariff laws, which destroyed the purchasing power of the farmer's dollar. Rural life in America began to decline. The Federal census began to count millions leaving the farms. Great cities were built up at the expense of the country. While farmers grew poorer, the most stupendous growth of industrial enterprises took place.

Discriminatory legislation continued. The manufacturer's tariff was built higher and higher. Not only was vicious legislation persisted in but policies of administration, equally as destructve, were put into practice. In 1920 this Republican Party, hostile to agriculture, approved in its platform a policy of deflation which, under President Harding, destroyed the farmer's capital. It manipulated the Federal reserve system, under President Coolidge, so as to destroy his credit. Every conceivable advantage was given to organized interests making campaign contributions, to the disadvantage of the great unorganized mass of farmers. Witness the growth of the great tobacco companies, while the farmer's tobacco is taken from him for a song. Duke, the tobacco manufacturer, after a life of luxury, left an estate of $200,000,000, while Hayseed, the tobacco grower, after a life of hardship and toil, left a penniless widow and three uneducated children. As a result of legislation and administration we see the farmer paying higher interest than any other industry, taxes levied against others passed on to be paid by him, his credit destroyed and capital gone.

Why should this be when there are more people to be fed? The world is now hungry. There is famine in other countries, undernourished school children in ours. There has never been a surplus of farm products. Under the present policies of crop distribution and market manipulation the farmer can not exist on the low prices he gets, while the poor can not buy for the high prices they must pay.

I charge the passing of prosperous, happy country life in America directly to the later-day policies of the Republican Party.

But I am aroused from my reverie. I see the old house as it is. It is different now. The stately old avenues, with the giant trees and bluegrass have been destroyed, for new land had to be supplied to pay the interest on the farm mortgage. There are no herds on the hill, for the large old rooms and halls now house the tobacco grown where they used to graze. The children do not go to college any more; they must work on the farm. The old lilac bush swaying in the wind is all that remains of the forgotten flowers. The old farm is to be sold to satisfy the debt to the Government or the insurance company. The old house, with shutters ajar, is a mere reminder of former greatness, when those who loved it not only lived in that house but in the "white house." It stands as a ghastly reminder of what has been done to the old farm home by the Republican Party.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the youngest Member of the House, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MOBLEY], who will deliver his maiden speech in the House. [Applause.]

Mr. MOBLEY. Mr. Chairman, for some time now the interest of the country has been concentrated upon the position of the United States Treasury. The question is asked, What created the deficit? The answer is simple. Revenue sources broke down at a time when expenditures were exceeding all peace-time precedents.

In 1929 the total expenditures of local, State, and Federal Governments reached the stupendous sum of $13,048,000,000, as compared with total expenditures of $2,919,000,000 in 1913. This shows an advance in per capita cost from $30.24 to $107.37 in 16 years.

Taxes during this period showed a corresponding increase. In 1913 total taxes levied by Federal, State, and local governments amounted to $2,187,000,000, and in 1930 to $10,251,000,000, of which $3,468,000,000 was collected by the National Government, $1,765,000,000 by State governments, and $5,018,000,000 by local governments. You will note, however, that this tax levy, the most stupendous that ever faced any nation in history, fell short of what we spent by about $3,000,000,000.

These figures are terrifying enough, but the story as it stands to-day is even worse. The tax bill of 1930 consumed 14.4 per cent of our national income, but we may expect the 1932 tax bill to consume at least 30 per cent, since our national income has shown a distressing shrinkage and taxes are being increased. Such a burden leaves capital without a fair return, and unless checked means confiscation of property for tax purposes. In a time of high prosperity such a burden could be borne, but is impossible now.

While statistics show that the percentage of increase in expenditures and in levy of taxes by State and local governments is much greater than by the Federal Government, it is a fact that the Federal Government has exceeded all bounds of reason. We have problems which transcend in importance even the urgent necessity of balancing the Budget by unearthing new sources of revenue. Supreme among these is the necessity for a reduction in expenditures. You may not doubt that the eyes of the country are upon us at this time and that the conviction of the business community is that the supreme fiscal calamity would not be our failure to balance the Budget, but our success in balancing it by levy of high taxes while sustaining the present scale of public expenditures. We are duty bound to reduce expenses in proportion to the reduction in income and property values in this country. We must set the example for the State and local governments to follow.

I voted for the tax bill; but had I known that this House would not show the political courage to pass an economy bill making up the $200,000,000 which the tax bill as it passed the House lacked in balancing the Budget I would never have cast my vote for it, because I do not believe we are justified in placing additional burdens upon the taxpayers without at the same time reducing expenses as much as possible. Provision after provision was stricken from the McDuffie bill, taking a total of $160,000,000 from the $200,000,000 saving which its enactment would have effected.

Those who voted to strike the $67,000,000 saving from pay cuts failed to offer anything to substitute for what was knocked out. Likewise, the Republicans in this House, joined by a few Democrats, who seemed to be more interested in looking after the interests of the Army and Navy than the welfare of the people of the country, as a whole, and in economy, offered nothing for the $100,000,000 saving that would have been effected by a consolidation of the Army and Navy, which their votes prevented. Not one Member who offered an amendment to strike provisions and economies from this bill offered a substitute. It does seem that if economy was desired, but not at the expense of their pet department or class, that they should have at least tried to make some other department carry their burden, and their failure to do so would indicate a lack of interest in economy.

While we have reduced appropriations for the departments around $160,000,000 below Budget estimates, and $42,000,000 was saved by the economy bill, there is still room for further reductions. The public has reached the conclusion that the reduction of expenditures on projects and agencies once started is an impossibility. The moral, they say, is do not start new governmental projects or agencies. I am in accord with the suggestion that no more projects or agencies be started, as I think we have carried that too far already; but to say do not start them because once started they can never be stopped, even where they have outlived the stage of usefulness and are no longer needed, presents a situation which questions the very fundamental validity of democracy. We must curtail the activities of the Government in order to save.

If we do not about face and show the people of this country that we have the courage to face the situation and reduce expenses, then we may as well admit that this Republic has become a government of, for, and by the politicians rather than of the people.

I am afraid that during the last few years the test of a Member of Congress's popularity and right to represent his district in the Congress has been the amount of appropriations he could dig out of the Federal Treasury for his district and for certain classes of people in this country. I am inclined to believe, gentlemen, that that sentiment is changing and that during the next few years it will not be how much he has succeeded in pulling out of the Treasury but what he has done to prevent raids upon it. [Applause.]

Gentleman of the committee, I agree with David Lloyd George when he said that the only test of high success in political life is service. Without genuine service the memory of those who hold the most glittering offices soon perishes, but it is he who serves that endures. We have a duty to our country to perform at this time, and we should meet the situation fearlessly and with the one purpose in mind of serving our country and our people in this time of great emergency and reduce governmental expenses. [Applause.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC].

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, at the beginning of this session of Congress, realizing the serious condition that existed among our farmers, I called the Oklahoma delegation together to meet with the Hon. John Simpson, president of the National Farmers' Union, for the purpose of agreeing upon a suitable agricultural bill. I knew then, as I know now, that our farmers were in a more distressed condition than ever before. I knew that they had been compelled to sell the fruits of their labor at a price much lower than the cost of production and that legislation should be enacted into law that would at least cause them to receive cost of production on that part which is needed for home consumption or they could not very much longer survive. The Oklahoma delegation agreed upon a program, and bills to carry out the same were immediately introduced. Since that time I have rewritten the pending legislation by providing a new section which would prohibit speculation on such farm products as would be designated by the Secretary of Agriculture unless there was an actual delivery of such commodity from the seller to the buyer, having in mind that the Farm Board lost millions of dollars of the money appropriated by this Government in such practices and that the only persons to profit were those who received commissions on such transactions. I am advised that now the Farm Board admits that bad judgment was used in adopting this policy and that the same will be abandoned in the future.

Everyone knows that the expenses of this Government should be reduced. Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture in 20 years has increased from $19,000,000 to $296,000,000. That of independent offices from $166,500,000 to $1,306,000,000. The Department of Commerce has increased from $15,000,000 to over $61,000,000; the Department of Justice from $9,000,000 to $41,800,000; the Treasury Department from $122,000,000 to $1,346,800,000; the War Department from $187,000,000 to $386,794,452; and practically this same ratio applies to all other departments and bureaus of the Government. At present there are over 1,000,000 on the Government pay roll, and the annual salaries amount to $1,315,000,000. I voted for the amendment which would have reduced the salaries of Members of Congress and those in the higher brackets 25 per cent. I also voted on roll call for every reduction sponsored by the Economy Committee. These will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 3, pages 9510 to 9518. It is unfortunate for the country that the Representatives from the big cities and industrial centers were able to defeat proposed reductions which would have amounted to over $100,000,000. I performed my duty, and no one can lay this blame at my door.

Mr. Chairman, there are over 53,000,000 of our citizens that depend directly or indirectly on agriculture for a livelihood. The source of practically all of our revenue comes from the ground, and it will be impossible to ever restore this Nation to normalcy unless proper attention is given this subject. The policy of beginning at the top and working down will have to be reversed. The value of the farmers' income since 1927 has been reduced more than 50 per cent, the amount of farm mortgages has increased more than 100 per cent, and at present practically all farms are a liability rather than an asset, yet no one will deny that prosperity can never return until those who till the soil are able to obtain a fair price for that which they produce.

This session is fast approaching the end, and the proposed farm legislation is still sleeping in the committee. I am amazed at the lack of interest in this subject, and there is one thing sure, I am not going to shoulder any blame for the failure of this legislation, as I have repeatedly urged the necessity for such legislation and am now ready to vote for a bill that will guarantee to our farmer cost of production on such yields as will be necessary for home consumption. I realize that it would be useless to pass such a law unless some bureau of the Government is given control over the marketing of all products. Otherwise importers could ship to the United States products of the farm sufficient to undersell our own products and defeat the principle established. Last year wheat in Germany and France brought to the producer over $1.50 per bushel. If other nations can protect their farmers, certainly no one can say that the United States should not give the same measure of relief to those entitled to it.

The most pitiful situation I ever witnessed now exists among those who live on the farm. I am sure every Member of this House who represents an agricultural district has said to his constituents that he will do everything in his power to see that some kind of legislation was passed that would make conditions better in the future.

In 1918, during the World War, Congress passed legislation for the purpose of providing not only cost of production but a profit on certain crops that were grown in this Nation. Likewise, speculation on the big exchanges to a certain extent was prohibited. The financial condition of our Nation was much better then than now. I can not understand why any Member of the House would not be willing to support a measure that would at least give to our farmers similar relief to that which was extended during the World War. Anyhow, sufficient to guarantee the cost of production on such crops as are needed for home consumption.

We have been wasting a lot of time here in quibbling over various matters that should have been sidetracked. In every letter I have received from those interested in this subject, they are asking why we do not do something to help the farmer. Why can't we stop all of this useless debate and perform some real service to the people? I hope that the leaders of both parties will soon realize that we are getting nowhere by throwing rocks back and forth at each other when time should be employed in behalf of legislation that will be beneficial.

I think President Hoover has used very poor judgment in giving out newspaper statements criticizing the House of Representatives, when he could have performed a real service by keeping the army of Government employees and the head of executive departments from lobbying against the economy bill. He could have done much better by inviting the leaders of both parties to the White House for a conference, and saying to them that an emergency exists, "Let us put our heads together and do something to help those who are in need of aid." All of us remember that President Wilson continuously called the leaders of both parties together and by so doing worked out a program which took care of the emergency condition. There may be some who will forget that my party has not been in power since the elections of 1920, and that no legislation could be enacted into a law unless it met the approval of the party leaders.

Notwithstanding this was true, I have voted for every bill in the interest of agriculture, and I now call upon my colleagues to join with me and pass the kind of relief legislation that will start at the bottom and work upward. Our people are more disturbed than ever before. They can not even pay their taxes. Many of them will lose their homes, and I venture to assert that if some kind of appropriate legislation is not passed during this session, the casualty list after the next election will be similar to that which existed after the Battle of the Marne.

Let us cut out all of this criticism that is coming first from a Democrat and then a Republican, and get together in a spirit of cooperation and complete this legislative program so we can go home. [Applause.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALLGOOD].

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to congratulate my friend the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCLINTIC] on his remarks that the time for talking ought to be over and the time for action is at hand.

I wish also to commend this body upon the constructive step it took some two months ago in regard to appropriating 40,000,000 bushels of wheat owned by the Government to be used and handled through the Red Cross for the poor. It was a constructive step that was taken by the Congress and has proven very beneficial to millions and millions of people who could not buy food and could not buy the other necessities of life and had not the wherewithal to sustain life.

We have another bill that is pending before this body that is constructive and is along the same line. It was introduced by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER] on January 4, and authorizes the distribution of Government-owned cotton by the governors of the various States through the Red Cross and other organizations to be used for people in distress.

The bill authorizing the use of wheat has proven beneficial, as the Red Cross will tell you, and thousands of people throughout the Nation will tell you that it has been a life-saver.

Then why not come along and give the poor people of this Nation a chance to get clothing to put on their backs, a chance to even get overalls? Why not give them the advantage of this cotton owned by the Government, just as we did the wheat? If there is justice in the wheat bill, then there is equal justice in the cotton bill.

If it is fair to relieve the western farmers of the surplus of wheat so as to get a better price for this year's crop, it is equally fair to the cotton farmer of the South to dispose of this surplus to people who can not buy. It will help poor people in towns, cities, and in the country, and will help the cotton farmer secure better prices for his cotton this fall.

To-day cotton is selling for the ridiculous price of 5 cents a pound. Yet, to-day in an Alabama paper I see that Mr. Williams, the cotton representative of the Federal Farm Board, states he is pleased at the reaction of his cotton plan. His plan is to sell 650,000 bales of Government cotton, beginning August 1, and to put it gradually on the market. He says that this plan of selling 650,000 bales is favorably received and generally accepted and is an assurance that there will be no dumping on a glutted market. I would like to know what he calls dumping if this is not dumping.

The 1932 crop will be going on the market in some sections on August 1, and the dumping of this 650,000 bales of Government cotton on the market just at the beginning of the cotton season certainly will further depress the market and injure the cotton farmer.

I, therefore, insist that the Agricultural Committee bring out the Fulmer bill so that this 500,000 bales of cotton can be made into clothes for those who are out of employment and who can not buy clothes, and also to the end that this cotton will not be dumped on the market just as the selling season begins for the new crop. [Applause.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I will take very little time. The Ways and Means Committee this morning stood by their position of yesterday in making an adverse report to the House on the Patman veterans' adjusted-compensation cash payment bill.

The information I have received is that this is the first time in 140 years that the Ways and Means Committee has reported a bill adversely to the House.

Now, when a resolution is offered for adjournment the last of May or the first of June, I hope all Members, all those who believe in having a vote on the Patman bill—I do not care whether you are for it or against it—but all of you that are for a vote I hope will vote against adjournment. I do not intend to ask the House to vote against the recess for the conventions, but I do intend to ask the House to vote against adjournment until a vote has been taken on the Patman bill. If the House desires to take a recess and then come back and vote on the Patman bill, that will be satisfactory to me; but I believe that certainly the House should be entitled to the chance to vote on this most important measure. If the Judiciary Committee of the House saw fit not to bring in an adverse report in order to give the House a chance to vote on the prohibition submission bill, I think the country at least is entitled to know how their Representatives in Congress stand on the soldiers' bonus.

The way the situation stands now, if it had not been for the adverse report we could get a vote on May 23 by signing a petition of 145, but now you can not possibly get a vote before June 13, and the papers have carried the statement that it is the intention to adjourn by June 10. Yesterday by voting to report the bill adversely to the House the Ways and Means Committee made it impossible to get a vote on the bill before June 13.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. SPARKS. Does not the gentleman think it would be fair, in view of the circumstances, that Congress may adjourn before the matter could be brought before the House, that the rules be liberalized so that it could be brought before the House?

Mr. CONNERY. I say this, in justice to the Ways and Means Committee and to the acting chairman of the committee, Mr. CRISP. Mr. PATMAN and I went to him yesterday and we asked him to call the committee together to-day. We spoke to the Speaker and also to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY]. Then we asked Mr. CRISP if he would call the committee into session this morning to take up the question of whether, under the conditions, the committee would reconsider and allow a vote to be obtained on this matter on May 23. Mr. CRISP was kind and fair enough to call the committee to-day. I have no knowledge of what occurred in the executive session of the committee to-day, but I asked Mr. CRISP whether things were just the same as yesterday, and he said they were.

Mr. GOSS. Has the gentleman thought of asking the Speaker to recognize the gentleman to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill?

Mr. CONNERY. I would be glad to do that; but then you would have to have a two-thirds vote to pass the bill, and I do not believe in bringing in such a controversial bill in that manner.

Mr. GOSS. Is not that the only way that you could get recognition before the time of adjournment, as the gentleman suggests.

Mr. CONNERY. That is the only way that I can see; but, as I understand, in view of the precedents in the past it would be an unheard-of precedent for the Speaker to recognize anybody to pass a bill which had been adversely reported by a committee.

Mr. MCKEOWN. The committee was not quite as generous as some of the dry members of the Committee on the Judiciary on the liquor question.

Mr. CONNERY. That is true. I know that the gentleman from Oklahoma and other members of the Judiciary Committee, who are dry, were in favor of allowing this matter to go to a vote on the question of the eighteenth amendment. I do not wish to criticize the Ways and Means Committee particularly, but I can not understand why any committee of the House of Representatives on a proposition as big as this, which the people of the United States are watching and want to see Congress vote on, should not give the House that opportunity. I do not care whether gentlemen are for or against the bonus, but is there a Member in this House who is afraid to stand up and vote for the bonus or vote against it? I would like to see Congress function as a representative body; and I am asking all of you, whether you believe in the bonus or not, if we can not get this matter up before the resolution for adjournment comes in, to vote down the resolution for adjournment.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I want to suggest as a reason why it will not come up the vote of the 13 out of the 25 who signed the adverse report.

Mr. CONNERY. I understand that; but I do not understand why they should, for the first time in 140 years, pick on the veterans to bring in an adverse report. I do not know who voted which way, and I do not care.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The report is on the table and it is signed by the 13 members.

Mr. CONNERY. That is all that I wish to say, Mr. Chairman. I have no feeling of bitterness toward anyone, but I hope, unless we can get a vote on this in the House, that the friends of the veterans will vote against adjournment when the resolution to adjourn comes in and keep the House in session until a vote is had. [Applause.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I would not have risen but for the question asked of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FULLER] by the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR], and I really feel that the gentleman from California, on further reflection, will withdraw his question and statement made in reference thereto. The question indicated that in many bills reported by the Committee on Appropriations this House had recklessly and oftentimes added to the amounts recommended by the Committee on Appropriations. I do not think the gentleman can sustain such a charge against the Members of the House. As to bills reported by the subcommittees on which I have served, to wit, the Departments of State, Commerce, Labor, Justice, and Navy, I have found the membership of the House willing to follow these subcommittees in practically all of their recommendations. If you will check statements made by the present and by former chairmen of the Committee on Appropriations since the Budget system has been in force, you will find that these several chairmen of the committee have taken pride in the fact that the House has saved not $100,000,000 but many hundred millions of dollars by sustaining the committee in reducing the estimates submitted by different Presidents. I am not aware of but comparatively few increases made by the House in the many bills reported by the Committee on Appropriations since the Budget has been in force. Certainly the charge would not apply to any of the five bills which I am thoroughly acquainted with. The members of the Committee on Appropriations have been called on sometimes to oppose reductions in appropriations proposed by some individual Member of the House under that recommended by the committee, and I make that statement in fairness and justice of the membership of the House as a body, irrespective of party. The Appropriations Committee has often referred with pride to the fact that the committee acts always in a nonpartisan way in dealing with appropriations, and we have appealed to the House for a nonpartisan support, and such support has usually been given. Who can forget the record of this House in saving not $9,000,000 not $50,000,000, but $100,000,000 or more in reference to one appropriation alone, namely, that relating to the Government's contribution to appropriations for the District of Columbia? It was the action of the House in upholding the recommendations of the House Committee on Appropriations that made it possible to save more than $100,000,000 in that one appropriation alone. I could list many other appropriations where the House has responded in a splendid, nonpartisan way to uphold our Appropriations Committee in reducing Budget estimates and which in the aggregate have exceeded $500,000,000 under Budget estimates since the Budget system was inaugurated.

This fiscal year you have supported the Committee on Appropriations to the extent of more than $140,000,000 under Budget estimates; and when the gentleman from California suggests that the House has largely added to the appropriations recommended by the House Committee on Appropriations, I feel it is unjust to the present and former membership of the House, and I am unwilling for the charge to go unanswered. [Applause.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. RAINEY] having resumed the chair, Mr. COOPER of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 11897, the War Department appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

FRATERNAL INSURANCE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to vacate the procedure by which the House on yesterday adopted Senate Concurrent Resolution 27, my purpose being, if that request is granted, to ask unanimous consent to vacate the order by which the amendment was adopted to that resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to vacate the procedure by which the amendment to Senate Concurrent Resolution 27 was adopted.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Reserving the right to object, may we learn something about the legislation?

Mr. LUDLOW. I will be glad to explain it if the House will indulge me for a few moments. This amendment to the resolution was designed to make it unnecessary to tear up in the city of Indianapolis and reestablish in the city of Washington, D. C., the insurance department of the National Fraternal Order of Knights of Pythias. In Indianapolis the order owns property worth over a million dollars, and the insurance department has over 100 employees who would be disastrously affected. There is perfect agreement among all interested parties that this is worthy legislation. It developed that there were some phases of it that were objectionable to one of the gentlemen of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and we have arrived at an understanding. An agreement will be reached on a form of legislation that will obviate all disagreements and that will be brought up for consideration later. The purpose of this is to clear the decks for that subsequent legislation.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The concurrent resolution will go back on the calendar in the original form?

Mr. LUDLOW. It will be on the Speaker's desk. It is a concurrent resolution and has already passed the Senate.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It will not be taken up for disposition to-day?

Mr. LUDLOW. No, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the matter will lie on the Speaker's table, to be taken up for consideration at some future time, as I understand the Members who were interested in the matter are not here to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is correct.

ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the bill H. R. 7726 was reported adversely by the Committee on Ways and Means to-day and now lies on the Speaker's table. I ask that it be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will refer it to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union under the rule.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In addition to the bill H. R. 7726, 18 other bills were reported adversely by the Committee on Ways and Means to-day. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the members of the Committee on Ways and Means other than those who signed the majority report have five legislative days in which to file minority views.

Mr. GOSS. Reserving the right to object, would it be possible to bring up the bill before those minority views were printed?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I do not think that the time in which the minority views may be filed will have any adverse effect on the consideration of the bills.

Mr. GOSS. But the bills might be acted upon before the minority views are printed, under the request made by the gentleman.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I very much regret to say that I do not think the legislation will be presented within that time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

THE DEFICIT AND HOW TO MEET IT

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks upon a House joint resolution which I introduced to-day, providing for an amendment to the income tax law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, with 6,000,000 facing starvation this winter, the only plan to receive the approval of smug tax dodgers is the proposal to throw men and women out of work or cut down their wages, thus lessening the consuming power of those affected and further slowing down the machinery of production and exchange.

This is no time to lessen Government activities, but rather the crucial moment when the Government should throw every ounce of its energy into stimulating every form of productive activity.

Private and local agencies are almost exhausted. Local relief is on the verge of collapse.

This is a national calamity and needs Federal initiative, intelligent planning, and coordination.

Picayune trimming of salaries may conserve a few dollars in the Treasury, but it can not put bread into the mouths of the starving.

This cry for economy is stupidly emphasized and misdirected. There is such a thing as being penny-wise and pound-foolish.

The depression is an economic penalty and must be met by measures analogous to those required in times of war. But in war times nobody has ever been foolish enough to breed discontent by cutting down wages.

TAKE UP THE SLACK BY MAKING WORK INSTEAD OF SLOWING DOWN BY CHEAP ECONOMIES

When private industry and commerce slow down so as to throw millions out of work, that is the very time when Government should increase instead of diminishing its activities and make up for the shortage of work by an extensive program of public improvements which will take up the economic slack and make jobs for those out of work. I am sure it is much better to build public buildings, public roads, and engage in other lasting enterprises than to spend billions for ordnance and ammunition that are only created to destroy and be destroyed.

Instead of taking a broad view of the situation, why engage in the petty undertaking of throwing men and women off the pay roll or of cutting down salaries to further lessen the purchasing power of the people?

THE FACTS OF THE CASE

There is a great hue and cry for economy in administration. The commotion is unjustified.

The startling fact is that in the last 10 years the actual cost of government has steadily decreased. Eliminating pensions, soldiers' compensations, grants to States, and other statutory or permanent appropriations, the actual cost of the Government in 1931 was $259,178,952 less than it was in 1921. Please study this table:

Actual cost of government has decreased in 10 years between 1921 and 1931

1931 Budget	$3,846,605,149
Deducting permanent appropriations, pensions, grants to States, and miscellaneous	2,571,744,682
Actual cost of government	1,274,860,467
1921, separating and deducting the permanent appropriations (i. e., pensions, grants to States, etc.) the actual cost of government was	1,534,039,419
Excess of running government in 1920 over 1930	259,178,952

The essential thing in this crisis is to raise more money, either by bonds or by increased taxes. Our trouble is due to lack of national income, not to lack of national wealth!

"BALANCING THE BUDGET"

This is a fine alliterative phrase and it is a question how far its euphony has affected its popularity. To my mind, it is rather overemphasized. The great paramount issue is unemployment and starting the wheels of industry and commerce.

This is not the first time the Nation has been in a financial hole, and it has invariably pulled itself out by a resort to various expedients.

Direct taxation is the most logical, on the theory that each generation should bear its burdens—particularly where those burdens are the result of their own folly. But where the burdens are of an unavoidable nature, such as of war, the outlay for the balancing of the Budget ought to be spread over a number of years.

There is no question as to the causes of the present panic—it arises from our own economic bungling:

a. The provocative Smoot-Hawley tariff, which cut down our customs revenue, provoked retaliatory tariffs in other countries, and literally wiped out our foreign trade.

b. The eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act, which since their enactment have sacrificed billions of dollars in excise taxes. These, together with the profits, have gone into the pockets of bootleggers and racketeers instead of into the National Treasury, which has been further depleted by $500,000,000 directly spent in futile attempts at enforcement. In addition to this, we must add to the debit side of the column an incalculable amount of indirect expenditures connected with the increase of judges, increase of courts, of jails, and of all the other incidents of enforcement. For instance, the apprehension of offenders, their trial, conviction, incarceration, and maintenance.

There is one peculiar feature of the present financial situation which distinguishes it from every other panic in history.

In the past there have been failures of crops and famine. In the present emergency there is no scarcity of crops; no scarcity of money. Granaries are filled to overflowing; warehouses stocked with commodities for which there are no markets. Six million workers out of work with no money to buy the products of the farm or factory. The banks to-day hold more money in deposits per capita than at any time in our history. And yet banks fail—2,200 of them in the last year—depriving the thrifty of their savings and thus further diminishing the purchasing power of the Nation.

To top these disasters has come the loss of customary revenues to the National Treasury—loss of customs' duties, due to lessened imports; loss of income taxes, due to the closing of factories, unemployment; and finally loss of excise taxes and other accustomed revenues.

So the people are in a hole and the Government is in a hole.

With this analysis of the situation before us, it would seem that whatever the plan decided upon, the primary and most essential move ought to be in the direction of increasing the buying power of the Nation, to take up the surplus of farm products and manufactured commodities which fill the granaries and warehouses.

This should be coupled with a contemporaneous effort to reestablish foreign trade and open up foreign markets.

I am sorry to have to concede that the consideration of this class of remedial measures must necessarily be laid aside for the present owing to the divergent policies of the two Houses and of the Executive. If something could be done in that direction, it would be materially helpful; but when leaders of party politics are committed to high-protective doctrines, there is no use in arguing with them. We must look for remedies purely domestic in their nature on which there is some probability of agreement.

MAKE WORK INSTEAD OF STOPPING IT

Being confined, therefore, to purely domestic remedies, what is the most natural policy that invites our approval? The natural thing to do is to increase the buying power by putting the idle to work. How should that be done? Obviously not by producing things of which there is an overabundance, but of things that will have a permanent value and add to the wealth of the Nation.

In this category are roads, highways, bridges, reforestation, and public buildings. Yet through some strange perversity of reasoning we find programs for these improvements deliberately scuttled and abandoned, inspired by an utterly false and ill-considered notion of economy. In other words, an unmistakable lapse into a policy of "penny-wise and pound-foolish."

WHY NOT ISSUE BONDS?

Here is a case where public bonds might well be issued for such permanent improvements.

The sale of these bonds would draw out hidden hoards, give employment, put money into circulation, and increase the purchasing power of vast numbers.

Prof. Edwin R. A. Seligman, of Columbia University, in an address delivered before the American Institute of Consulting Engineers on January 18, 1932, asked a very pertinent and pregnant question. He said:

> I venture to ask why is it not better to lean backward a bit, to go a little slow, to do in this peace crisis what we did in the war crisis? In the crisis of war we had no difficulty in maintaining the credit of the United States We borrowed about 80 per cent and taxed about 20 per cent in order to raise the thirty-five or forty billions of dollars that we shot away in a year and a half of warfare. Why is it not desirable to go a little more heavily on the debt side and a little more lightly on the tax side in meeting the present emergency?

I repeat, "Why not?" The Treasury Department a few days ago opened the bids for an issue of several hundred million dollars of United States short-term notes. It was found that the issue was oversubscribed ten times, which shows that investors are hungry for the opportunity to take out their hidden hoards and put them at the disposal of the country.

There is one way to bridge us over the present difficulty and lay the foundations for a plan of public improvements of great and permanent value. But, no! Instead of undertakings to make work and furnish employment, we are presented with a foolish program of so-called economies, the cutting down of appropriations, the reduction of salaries, and a general slowing down of Government activities—the inevitable effect of which will be to throw thousands out of work and diminish the purchasing power of all whose incomes are affected.

It is true that cutting down appropriations will lighten the expenditures from the National Treasury, but that is only one side of the picture. It may help the inanimate Treasury, but how about the living, hungry man?

The Government owes a duty to the people and to itself in an emergency such as this, and that is to put as much money in circulation as possible—I do not mean by printing it—and enhance as far as possible the purchasing powers of the Nation, to take up the slack in the channels of commerce, taking inactive commodities out of the warehouses and putting them into the market.

THE REAL SOLUTION

The real solution of the problem is not to hold money out of circulation or curtail the Nation's buying power, thus enlarging the pool of stagnation into which business has been driven, but rather to stimulate the currents of commerce into a healthy, normal flow of activity.

In other words, the present plan of economy, so much heralded, is the exact reverse of the course which both common sense and past experience unquestionably demand.

Are we so blind as not to see the plain markers in the channels of progress which should direct our course?

NOW FOR TAXATION

Our situation points directly toward the adoption of a plan of direct taxation, simpler and more reliable than our present system. The banks show deposits greater per capita than at any time in our history—in other words, plain, unsocial, unpatriotic hoarding.

It is childish to stand helplessly by and plead with the hoarders to put their money into circulation. The way to handle these hoarded funds is to put it into circulation by the processes of taxation.

Deprived as we are of the customs duties from foreign trade, of the excise taxes by prohibition, we are compelled to throw all our dependence on the income tax.

NOW LET EVERYONE "CHIP IN"

I want to show how this can be done. It may seem like heresy, but the conviction is beginning to dawn on the average voter that there is something radically wrong with the income tax.

How much is needed to balance the Budget? Two billion two hundred million dollars, which means $18 per capita. This is a situation where everybody should "chip in."

The plan I propose is embodied in the following House joint resolution which I introduced to-day:

> Resolved, etc., That there shall be levied, collected, and paid by individuals and corporations, irrespective of and in addition to, the income tax they are subject to under the existing law, or any amendment thereof, a special tax of 1 cent on each dollar of gross income for the calendar years 1932, 1933, and 1934.

The object of this bill is to do away with doctoring of incomes by paid revenue experts, many of whom learned all the wrinkles while working for Uncle Sam in the Treasury Department.

This vocation has become an art, and is abused to such an extent that in 1930 out of 498,110 corporation returns only 214,412 show taxable incomes and paid taxes.

Out of 3,376,552 individual income-tax returns only 1,429,877 paid taxes. The rest dodged!

Out of $101,812,529,678 gross incomes—individual and corporation—taxes were paid on only $22,848,066,615. The rest got off by deductions and exemptions.

See details in following table:

Analysis of 1930 income returns

	Total returns	Returns taxed	Taxes dodged (not taxed)	Gross incomes	Net incomes	Deductions not taxed	Taxes paid
Corporations	498,110	214,412	283,698	$79,147,023,818	$5,627,312,995	$73,519,710,823	$618,246,431
Individuals	3,376,552	1,946,675	1,429,877	21,665,505,860	17,220,753,620	4,444,752,240	473,689,563
Total	3,874,662	2,161,087	1,713,575	100,812,529,678	22,848,066,615	78,164,463,063	1,091,935,994

NOTE.—A tax of 1 cent on all gross incomes will raise $1,000,000,000.

The plan, in short, is to get back to the direct system.

The key to a just tax is to deal with gross income, because that is always ascertainable. A dark curtain hides the deductions used to reach a net income; behind that curtain is all the mechanism of fraud. Exemptions are generally inequitable, no matter how plausible they seem.

Let the individual subordinate his expenses to his obligations to the Government.

It will be impossible for a while, at least, to abandon tariff duties and other forms of special taxation for the benefit or protection, so called, of favored interests.

Protective tariffs now justify exemptions from income taxation in the lower brackets of those upon whose backs the burdens of all taxes fall. When favoritism in taxation is abandoned, we will be ready, perhaps, for a direct and equitable tax upon all classes of earners.

If my proposal is written into the law, it will raise an income of $1,000,000,000 a year.

With this revenue assured, it will afford an opportunity to avoid the increase of the 2-cent postal rate to 3 cents, a harassing and stupid proposal, which does much to hamper mail advertising and charitable drives.

If the 3-cent rate goes into effect, it will drive advertisers into the columns of bulky magazines (weighing 16 ounces) which are carried at a loss by the Post Office Department for a fraction of a cent each. (Perhaps that is the true object of the increase?)

THE PROPOSED LAW WILL BE SELF-REGULATORY AND INESCAPABLE

The tax is self-regulatory. It is figured on the income-tax returns and paid at the same time and in the same manner as the income tax. It can not be evaded. There will hereafter be "no taxless income-tax returns." All will pay on the basis of business done whether they show a net profit or not. It is absurd for a corporation doing a business of $100,000 a year not to show a net income which is taxable.

A 1-cent per dollar addition to the income tax will spread the burden and the steadiness of revenue obtained will enable Congress to eventually get away from the intricate bracket schemes in the present law a thing that every honest business man is anxious to accomplish.

By arranging their budgets, corporations and individuals will be able to figure on this disbursement as a part of their overhead. It is not an arbitrary tax, but one depending on the business done, or salary received.

INSURANCE OF BANK DEPOSITS

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the question of insurance of bank deposits.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, I have been requested to submit for the information of the House some excerpts from a statement made by myself concerning the Nebraska bank guaranty law to a subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee while it was considering H. R. 11362, the Steagall bill, for the guaranty of bank deposits.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have been much interested and have given considerable study to the proposition of the insurance of bank depositors against loss because of bank failures. In 1909 the Nebraska State Legislature passed a bill which I approved, known as the Nebraska bank guaranty law, which provided for the insurance of bank deposits by a guaranty fund which was created by the banks of Nebraska by special assessments levied for that purpose.

In 1929, because of many bank failures, the Legislature of Nebraska passed a special act authorizing an investigation of the entire banking situation in the State, and appropriated $150,000 to carry out the purposes of the law. The bill authorized the governor to appoint a chief examiner to have charge of the work of investigation. I was appointed to that position by Gov. A. J. Weaver in May, 1929.

For about a year and a half thereafter, I was engaged in the investigation authorized by the special act. All of the offices in the various divisions of the department of banking were made subject to the supervision of the chief examiner and a corps of competent certified public accountants were employed as special auditors to assist in the work.

Notwithstanding the fact that the Legislature of Nebraska repealed the State guaranty law in March, 1930, I am still of the opinion that a law to insure bank depositors against loss is necessary if we are to maintain the American system of independent bank units. The fact that more than 8,000 banks have suspended in the last 10 years in the United States with over two billions of the people's money placed in jeopardy because of these failures is warrant for additional legislation to better protect depositors in the banks of this country.

Such a law is essential to the return of confidence in the security of our banking institutions. Until depositors are made confident that their deposits are safe, there can be no restoration of prosperity. The profits in the banking business are made from the use of the people's money deposited in the banks. For that reason depositors are entitled to every possible protection the law can afford. Bank profits do not come from the use of the bank's capital. The capital investment required of banks is a provision of law for the security of the depositors. Bank deposits supply both the money and credit that are the lifeblood of trade and commerce.

The Steagall bill proposes to create a guaranty fund to insure against loss the depositor whose money makes possible all the profit in the banking business. A depositors insurance law has been twice sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States in decisions declaring the Nebraska bank guaranty law constitutional. Therefore the legality of the guaranty principle is beyond question.

Mr. Chairman, I will make a brief statement as to the results of the Nebraska law. It became effective in 1911. From that date until 1920 only three banks failed in Nebraska. The deflation policy begun in 1921 was a deadly blow to the prosperity of the agricultural States. By 1929, 273 Nebraska State banks had failed, and the ability of the guaranty fund to pay the losses from these failures became a serious question.

Banking insurance is vitally different from life insurance, to which it has sometimes been compared. There is an average death loss among persons without much change throughout the years. This is not at all true as to banks. In the last three years more banks failed in the United States than during the 15 prior years.

The tremendous losses caused by a multitude of failures require unusual resources and a large insurance fund if depositors are to be fully protected from loss. State guaranty laws, being pioneers in bank guaranty legislation, did not build insurance funds big enough to stand the great financial strain which comes in times of national panic.

The administration of State banking laws because of the interference of politicians is often weak and ineffective. It can not be denied that if there had been competent supervision of the banks of Nebraska, a supervision insistent upon strict observance and enforcement of banking laws, a supervision that would not permit bankers to violate recognized sound business principles, the failures would not have occurred that wrecked the bank guaranty fund of the State.

If a sound depositors' insurance law were in force to-day, under the supervision and control of the Federal reserve system, deposits in the member banks of the United States would double in a few years. When the bank guaranty law was passed in Nebraska the Nation had just gone through the panic of 1907. Deposits in the State banks amounted to about $75,000,000 in the 615 banks then in operation. In 1920, after 11 years under the guaranty law, deposits had grown to $250,000,000. Deposits in State banks were not only increased by more than 300 per cent, but Nebraska was steadily drawing deposits from other States because of the protection of the guaranty law.

I was appointed to the position of chief examiner of banks in Nebraska in 1921. A call for bank statements was made in March of that year; although 273 banks had failed during the years immediately prior to 1929, there was only four millions less of deposits in the State banks of Nebraska in March, 1929, than there was at the peak of the war boom in 1920, when over 1,000 State banks were in operation.

The fact that deposits did not decline in the face of a multitude of bank failures showed the sustaining power of the bank guaranty law. If a State bank failed in Nebraska during that period, depositors were paid in full and the money was deposited in another bank protected by the guaranty law. Under such a system there are no runs on banks. Officers who failed as guardians of the trust imposed upon them might wreck their institutions, but the people of Nebraska refused to withdraw their money from the State banks so long as they experienced the benefits of the guaranty system.

I will include in my remarks a part of a report I made to the Governor of Nebraska on August 1, 1930, in which I attempted to point out some of the reasons for the failure of the State guaranty fund law. "Banking laws, no matter how sound and carefully drawn, will not insure depositors against loss if bankers are permitted to continually violate the most important provisions of the laws enacted to protect them. The bank guaranty law of Nebraska established an insurance fund for the protection of depositors. The annual assessments for the payment of losses were based on Federal reports of the average losses of depositors in national banks from 1862 to 1929. In 67 years only sixty-seven millions were lost to depositors in national banks."

For many years before the war boom multiplied the number of banks in Nebraska and inaugurated an era of wild speculation, depositors in Nebraska State banks lost no money and public confidence in the guaranty fund was complete. Enforcement of four sound banking principles are essential to the success of a guaranty of deposits law. First, limitation of bank charters of depository banks to the necessary requirements of business and the safe credit of the community served. Second, bank earnings of sufficient amount must be made to insure a fair return upon invested capital and the charging out of losses that come in periods of business depression. Third, competent, fearless, and efficient supervision by the executive department in charge of the administration and management of banks. Fourth, complete authority of the department of banking to grant or refuse bank charters and to require proper certificates of character and ability from officers and managers of banks.

Failure to observe and enforce these essentials of sound and safe banking undermined and wrecked the Nebraska guaranty law. During the war boom, 315 additional State banks were chartered in Nebraska. The courts decreed that under existing law, the State banking department could not refuse bank charters. This decision denied to the State's officers a power essential to the safety of banking and the security of the bank guaranty fund. The legislature later passed a law to correct this defect, but the act was suspended by referendum petition and later was defeated at the polls. Subsequently hundreds of banks were chartered for which there was no economic justification.

Too many banks and too few bankers bred bankruptcy in the banking business in Nebraska. Banks which were hopelessly insolvent were permitted to continue in operation and receive deposits. A governor stated in a message to the legislature that early in his administration the bank commissioner reported to him that more than 125 State banks were hopelessly insolvent.

A bank commission of another administration stated that he made a report showing that 150 State banks were at that date insolvent. Permitting these broken banks to remain open only delayed the deluge of bank failures. Lax law enforcement did not save the insolvent banks. It did cost depositors millions in losses and piled up a mountain of bankruptcy when these conditions could no longer be concealed.

The greatest weakness in our State and National governments to-day is failure to enforce laws enacted for the protection of property and the punishment of crime. Unsafe expansion during the war-boom period led to an extraordinary and dangerous inflation in both loans and credits. Too many banks led to ruinous competition. Bad loans became common because there were not enough safe borrowers to absorb the funds that must be loaned to make a show of profit. These paper profits disappeared when deflation had done its work. Millions of dollars of worthless loans encumbered the note cases of the banks audited during the investigations. Very often more than half the loans in failed banks were found worthless because the officers making them were speculators rather than bankers.

Destruction of agricultural credit, dishonest and incompetent banks, weak supervision, and lack of law enforcement were the chief causes of the bank failures which destroyed the bank guaranty law of Nebraska. The law brought prosperity and strength to the State banks and saved depositors from losses of millions of dollars. It was discredited and destroyed by those who should have been its stanchest defenders, because it brought them tremendous increases of both business and profit.

Bad banking and inefficient supervision finally nullified the law and destroyed the confidence it had established. My report to the legislature, dated August, 1930, showed a total liability because of losses in failed banks of $101,981,000 against the guaranty fund. Payments from the fund and assets still on hand left the estimated deficit in payment of losses at a sum of about $20,000,000.

A so-called depositors' settlement law was passed by the State legislature in 1930, which required the banks to pay a large part of the losses then due. On that proposition the legislature repealed the law. The protection and benefits the law afforded depositors in the State banks during the years it was properly enforced are not forgotten by the people of Nebraska. They will gladly welcome a Federal law to insure their money against loss because of the failure of banks intrusted with their savings.

BUDGETS—NORMAL AND ABNORMAL

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting a radio address by David Lawrence on normal and abnormal budgets.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by David Lawrence delivered over the network of the National Broadcasting Co. system on May 1, 1932, from 9 to 9.15 p. m., eastern daylight saving time:

During the last few weeks a number of corporations have sent out to thousands of their stockholders and friends printed circulars, more or less identical, discussing Government expenditures. While we all agree with the major objective of such a discussion, namely, to bring about a reduction of expenditures, still it is apparent from the letters I have been receiving lately that these circulars have not been fully understood.

First, let me tell you what the circular says. It makes the point that we spent $1,231,000,000 less in 1927 than we did in 1932, and asks the very interesting question why the Government can not now live under the same Budget that it did in 1927; and, hence, why can not all new taxes be avoided, especially since the amount of money expected to be raised by new methods of taxation is an equivalent sum, namely, about $1,200,000,000.

Well, first, we must draw a distinction between the fiscal year 1932 and the calendar year. The Government's year is from July 1 to July 1 of the next year. Thus, the expenditures for the fiscal year ending on June 30, 1932, have been nearly all made, and what Congress is discussing now is the new Budget which takes effect July 1 next. We can not recover the money already spent or effect any economies on a fiscal year that is nearly over.

Indeed, to understand the expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932—the one referred to in the circular—we must go back to the summer of 1930. The Budget Bureau began work then on estimates. Congress met in December, 1930, and began passing appropriation bills, so that by January, 1931, many of the bills had become law and all were out of the way by March 4, 1931. That is when consideration was being given to the expenditures classified under the heading of 1932 in that circular.

Now, what was the situation in the summer of 1930? The depression became a matter of public concern in November, 1929, and during the following two or three months Congress was besought by business people as well as by citizens generally to stem the tide of unemployment by construction of public works. The theory that public works would give not only employment but would help the purchase of raw materials was dominant. It was not until April or May, 1931, when the policy of spending for public works began to be attacked. Indeed, in the same winter of 1931, the soldier bonus bill was passed over a presidential veto, too, on the petition of many business as well as veterans' organizations who believed it would help put money into circulation.

I have examined the so-called 1932 Budget, and compared it with the 1927 Budget, to discover why it was we had an increase of $1,231,000,000 in expenses. Practically all of the increase was due to emergency appropriations in the interest of construction or agricultural relief or public roads or veterans' expenses. For example, in the fiscal year 1927 the expenditures for public works were approximately $188,000,000, while the expenditures for the same thing in the 1932 Budget will have amounted to $623,000,000. This is an increase of about $435,000,000. Now, this includes Federal aid for highways and the public-building program of the Treasury Department, river and harbor and flood-control work, and other nonmilitary activities of the War Department.

I come now to the next big increase, which is about $155,000,000 for the agricultural marketing fund, spent largely on stabilization operations in an effort to prevent the failure of hundreds of banks in the Middle West. This was another emergency operation due to the depression.

Then we find $167,000,000 increase due to the postal deficit. The postal receipts always fall off when business declines. So here, too, the depression accounts for another increase. Thus far we may total up the increases of $435,000,000 for public works, $155,000,000 for agricultural marketing, and $167,000,000 for postal deficit, and we have $757,000,000 toward that unexplained item of $1,231,000,000.

Well, now add $246,000,000 for the adjusted-service veterans' certificates known as soldier bonus, and this brings the total increases of 1932 over 1927 up to more than $1,003,000,000, and you can add to that $75,000,000 for Navy construction and shipping construction loans to keep the shipyards busy and shipbuilding employees at work, and $47,000,000 for additional aircraft construction and aviation activities, $37,000,000 in settlement of war claims, and, finally, $69,000,000 scattered through various departments for increased expenses, some of them due to the decennial census and some to immigration and naturalization activities, strengthening of the departments engaged in the detection and prosecution of crime, thus adding up to about $1,231,000,000.

Of course, you are interested in learning whether these same items are to continue in the new Budget, which is now under consideration, and what has been done by way of economies, as compared with the Budget that comes to an end June 30 next.

I promised last Sunday night that I would try to-night to trace the work that has been done on the new Budget, known as the 1933 Budget but beginning July of this year. The Budget Bureau began the making of estimates for this last summer, and by the time Congress met last December the 1933 Budget was submitted. It showed a cut of more than $369,000,000, as compared with that so-called 1932 Budget. Congress has been busy trying to cut it still further. There are differences of opinion as to how it should be done. The Executive, through the Treasury, has submitted one plan, the House of Representatives has another, and the Senate has its own ideas about how to make economies, and judging by the 30,000 telegrams that came in on one day when Congress tried to eliminate the $9,000,000 appropriation for vocational education there are groups and organizations throughout the country which still have other ideas on the subject.

To date there are nine appropriation bills, some of which have become law and others of which are in their latest stages, which reveal a total economy of about $139,000,000 under the Budget as submitted last December, and the general expectation is that this economy will be increased to about $200,000,000 when all the bills become law. So the $200,000,000 added to the $369,000,000, which I said was cut by the Budget Bureau itself, reveals a total saving of $569,000,000 over 1932, which would make the new Budget for 1933 about $3,900,000,000.

Now, if we look at the same items in the 1933 Budget that we found had increased the 1932 Budget so considerably over 1927, we discover that these alone would run about $772,000,000. To put it another way, we still have with us expenses on account of the depression, abnormal expenses, which if subtracted from the new 1933 Budget, would bring us down to $3,136,000,000 for 1933, which is the figure that should be used in comparing with 1927 expenditures, when we had no depression. Actually, if we eliminate only veterans' relief and public construction and roads and items having to do with creating labor for the unemployed, the proposed Budget with the pending economies is the lowest the Government of the United States will have operated on since pre-war days.

I used the figure $3,136,000,000. Now, of that sum about $500,000,000 is to be borrowed to pay sinking fund on war debt, so the total amount that would have to be raised by taxation would be $2,636,000,000. Bear in mind that the present fiscal year—that is, the present rates of taxation—will have brought in by next July something under $2,000,000,000, so even if we were able to eliminate the $772,000,000 for public works and construction and unemployment relief and veterans' expenses, altogether we still would find that we had to increase taxes so as to get nearly $700,000,000 more revenue to balance what would be a normal Budget.

Here again the depression enters into our calculations, and the shrinkage of income of more than 50 per cent puts the Federal Government in the position, even if it eliminated all abnormal expenses due to the depression, of being required to increase taxes or borrowings to take care of its deficit.

So the circular which I referred to at the outset of this talk might have better compared the expenses of 1927, not with fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, for which plans were made in the summer of 1930, when we had our first few months of depression psychology, but with the proposed Budget which will take effect on July 1 next and which will cover governmental expenses until June 30, 1933. And in that Budget will be found economies of more than a half billion as compared with the present fiscal year.

There is no doubt that these circulars distributed by business corporations to their stockholders, employees, and friends serve to focus attention on Federal expenditures, and the effect of such discussion unquestionably is being registered in the current debates in Congress, but we are apt to forget that the biggest items of expense arise out of city and State budgets, which, combined, account for three-fourths of all the taxes collected or money spent for governmental purposes in America.

I spoke a few weeks ago about the importance of voting between elections, of registering your opinion with your Senators and Representatives. But I also said that it is not helpful unless you are specific. Now, it has no particular value at this juncture merely to tell Congress expenses ought to be reduced. Congress knows that now. Public opinion has crystallized on that point quickly and effectively. What Congress wants to know is specifically what items you would like to see repealed or rejected.

For instance, if all the corporations in question were to send out letters to all their stockholders and employees and friends saying they want the soldier bonus law repealed and the commitments made to veterans repudiated, that would be a specific recommendation which Congress would understand though I doubt whether any company depending on the patronage of the public would care to antagonize organized groups any more than Members of Congress apparently wish to do. If any of these corporations would like to send letters out to their stockholders, employees, and friends asking the Government at Washington to repeal every form of Federal aid, including money for aviation, for ship construction, for public roads, for agricultural aid, for aid to the banks or railroads; indeed, for any form of governmental subsidy or help, why Congress would understand that, too, and know what it meant, but I doubt whether any single corporation or group of corporations would care to do so because of the antagonism created among their own customers who, directly or indirectly, are affected either in the purchases of raw materials or by-products.

Then what can a worried executive, responsible for a big corporation, do about it? Must he face the increased tax burden without a protest? There is no doubt that insistence by the people on reduced expenditures would get further if a scientific study of governmental costs were undertaken by disinterested groups and their recommendations were to be supported by the citizenry of the Nation. There is no doubt, too, that Congress is troubled by the groups back home which plague it for specific legislative aid in one form or another.

Attention to what the organized groups are doing back home would relieve the pressure on Congress, especially if the communities argued these questions out for themselves, and if on the same day that one group was asking Congress to economize another group from the same city was not sending telegrams and letters asking Congress to appropriate money quickly for that post-office building which has been neglected and on which the blue prints are all ready and for which hundreds of hungry workmen are patiently waiting for their long-anticipated job.

I have been receiving letters from some people who think I have not been sufficiently indignant about Government extravagance and waste. I can only say that Government does not exist for the few but for the many; that Government money is spent on the theory of benefiting all the people and not a special class; that Government employees, including clerks and letter carriers, are human beings, too, with families to educate and babies to feed, just like the rest of us; and that there are two ways to cut a budget—one is with the surgeon's knife and the other with the hatchet of human misery.

A crippled governmental machinery demoralizes personnel, causing a turnover and loss exceeding the amounts theoretically saved. We know there is suffering outside the Government on the part of those unemployed, those who have had their pay cut. So also will there be hardship upon many in the Government service who will also have their wages cut down materially, as is now indicated by pending legislation. But what shall we say of a system of budget cutting that throws forty or fifty thousand more people out to the soup kitchens and bread lines to be supported by taxes coming out of the city and State and county treasuries? There is no net gain there to society, but an increase of the people's net expense.

We must balance the Budget, yes; but we need not and will not destroy the Government in doing it. And in the course of the next 8 or 10 months, even after the new Budget is adopted, there will be pressure to find further economies; and this will continue, as it must be, backed by an alert and aroused public opinion. But these things will be accomplished not by hysteria, not by disregard of the facts, not by withdrawing from one group what ungrudgingly is granted to another group, but by patient and unremitting study on the part of public servants and disinterested groups of an economy program that is continuous and within the limits of efficient government.

JOHN VANDLING LESHER

Mr. MAGRADY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD to pay tribute to a former Member of this House who represented the sixteenth district in Pennsylvania from 1913 to 1921, Mr. John V. Lesher.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MAGRADY. Mr. Speaker, John Vandling Lesher was born July 27, 1866, in Union Township (Blue Hill), Union County, Pa. His parents were Robert Lesher and Sara Vandling. He was one of a large and highly respected family of which 10 members—7 sisters and 3 brothers—still survive. His early education was acquired in the public schools of the vicinity where he was born. He prepared for college in Bloomsburg State Teachers' College, known at that time as Bloomsburg State Normal School.

After several years of service as a public-school teacher, John Lesher entered Bucknell University, Lewisburg, and was graduated with the class of 1897. He was a noted football player at the university in those early days of the game.

When Company K of the emergency regiment, National Guard of Pennsylvania, was organized in 1898, John Lesher enlisted and served during the Spanish-American War. Upon transfer of the company to the Twelfth Regiment, he was made a first lieutenant and later appointed captain and quartermaster, in which capacity he served until about 1902 when he retired from the guard.

John Lesher was admitted to the bar of Northumberland County July 2, 1900, and to the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania January 5, 1903. He practiced his profession and served as assistant district attorney of Northumberland County for one term. He was one of the organizers of the State Bank at Hummels Wharf, Snyder County; and served as a vice president and director of it.

He was a member and past master of Lodge No. 632, Free and Accepted Masons, in Sunbury; a member of Northumberland Royal Arch Chapter, No. 174; Mount Hermon Commandery, No. 85, Knights Templar, of Sunbury; the Temple Club; the Susquehanna Valley Country Club; and Sunbury Lodge, No. 267, Benevolent and Patriotic Order of Elks.

Hon. John V. Lesher was elected as a Democrat and served the sixteenth congressional district of Pennsylvania, composed of Northumberland, Columbia, Montour, and Sullivan Counties (later known as the seventeenth district), in the Sixty-third, Sixty-fourth, Sixty-fifth, and Sixty-sixth Congresses (March 4, 1913, to March 3, 1921), with credit to his party and satisfaction to his constituents as well. His service extended over the troublesome times of the World War.

After suffering an illness extending over a number of years, he departed this life on May 3, 1932, at 7 a. m. at the Geisinger Memorial Hospital, Danville, Pa.

It was my personal privilege and pleasure to be associated with John V. Lesher during his school days while he was preparing for college. We occupied the same room; slept in the same bed; and wrestled with the same problems, frequently on opposing sides. It can truthfully be said that John Lesher was the type of man who could be relied upon to do the fair and correct thing when it became his duty to assert his judgment in affairs concerning public welfare or activities among his acquaintances and fellow men. He was an outstanding citizen and public official who will be missed in the community where his business activities were quite noted. During his entire illness his courage never faltered and he bore his affliction with a good nature that but few persons possess.

This brief recital of the passing of a dear friend, Hon. John V. Lesher, is but a note indicating that the Grim Reaper is gathering us in, one by one, not telling who shall be called to answer his next roll.

REGULATION OF BUSSES, TRUCKS, AND WATER CRAFT

Mr. BRAND of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and insert in the RECORD a letter which I have myself written to W. W. Atterbury, president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, on the subject of the regulation of trucks and busses, in answer to one from him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRAND of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following correspondence between Hon. W. W. Atterbury, president of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., and myself, relative to the regulation of trucks, busses, and water craft.

THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD CO., GENERAL OFFICE,
Philadelphia, March 15, 1932.

Hon. CHARLES BRAND,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN BRAND: As you are, of course, aware, the hearings before the Interstate Commerce Commission on the report proposed by Attorney-Examiner Flynn, as to the coordination of rail and highway transport, have been completed, bringing to a close the commission's prolonged and painstaking investigation of this matter. Presumably the commission, in the light of the suggested report and its thorough discussion, will now proceed to decide upon definite recommendations to Congress, which also has before it the Couzens bill.

I am already indebted to you for two letters in reference to the subject, prompted by your reading a copy of a talk which I delivered in Birmingham, Ala., during January. In the course of it I commented briefly upon the proposed Flynn report, and adverted to what I considered to be the urgent necessity for fair and proper regulation, not only of commercial highway service but of transportation upon the inland waterways and by vessels in the coastal, intercoastal, and Great Lakes trades.

The interest and concern which you have manifested toward these extremely important questions command my sincere admiration. Ultimate disposal of the problems involved lies in the hands of Congress. My present purpose in writing further to you upon the subject is to make my own views better understood.

First of all, I ask you to accept my assurance that I do not now advocate, and never have advocated, making highway or water transportation artificially expensive in order that traffic may be returned to the rails. Our position in this respect is on record in the testimony presented on behalf of the Pennsylvania Railroad before the Interstate Commerce Commission, March 4, 1931, in the proceedings which led up to the tentative Flynn report. Our spokesman, Mr. J. F. Deasy, vice president of the Pennsylvania Railroad's central region, said: "Under no circumstances do I advocate regulation for the purpose of restricting highway competition for the benefit of rail carriers."

This thought was reiterated and emphasized several times in the course of the testimony. It expresses our policy to-day, and is the only one which, in my opinion, could be justified. It is also the policy of the railroads in general, as was set forth with great particularity and reaffirmed on several occasions by counsel for the Association of Railway Executives during the hearings before the commission.

I gather from your two letters that, unfortunately, you have interpreted it to be my position that rates for highway and water transportation should be made "as high as the present railroad rates." Nothing could be further from my thoughts. What I do believe is that regulation should be so applied that all rates, by all agencies of service, should be reasonable and compensatory, which is by no means universally the case at present. If that condition were brought about, and substantial equality established in other respects, then under the working of natural economic law each form of transportation would automatically tend to gravitate to those fields of service for which it is inherently best fitted, i. e., in which it can render the kind of service which, all things considered, is cheapest and best for the public.

Just how highway and water rates would, under such conditions, compare with the present railroad rates is a question which I do not think anyone can answer specifically at this time. Undoubtedly some would be higher and others would be lower. The determination of what constitutes a compensatory rate would be the duty of the regulative authority, and it would be necessary to take into consideration all of the real costs of the service.

This would involve the determination, for instance, of the question whether or not vehicles operating for hire upon the highways are contributing in taxation their fair share of highway costs, both for construction and upkeep. As Attorney-Examiner Flynn has pointed out, the basis for an authoritative answer to this question does not now exist, because such vehicles are not now required to keep accounts and make reports of their operations. Hence, their relative use of the highways is unknown. Regulation, by requiring such reports and accounts, would make it possible to determine the adequacy or inadequacy of taxation upon the basis of proved facts. I agree with Mr. Flynn's view that the necessary information should be obtained in order that this often bitterly controverted question might be settled.

In the case of the inland waterways, determination of compensatory rates, based upon true costs, would involve frank recognition of the fact that all transportation upon these waterways is now subsidized, because it pays no capital charges on the investment in the artificially constructed channels, with their accompanying dams, locks, etc., nor does it contribute anything to the annual cost of maintaining these works. Every common carrier, including the Inland Waterways Corporation, engaged in service on these waterways, is therefore in a position comparable to that of a railroad company for which the Government, at the taxpayers' expense, provided and maintained a right of way, and improved and extended it from time to time.

The inland waterways are built and maintained at the expense of all the taxpayers of the country, including the railroads—the largest single group of all taxpayers. Yet the waterways benefit only selected communities and limited areas, while the railroads, the chief contributors to waterway development, are forbidden, under the Denison Act, to use them at all or participate in their benefits.

Railroad rates and fares are intended to cover all the real costs of the service, including operating expenses, taxes, depreciation, and such return as may be permitted upon invested capital. The permitted return on the railroad investment has for many years been inadequate, nor has it ever been earned, taking the railroads as a whole or by rate districts. However, railroad operations are nonsubsidized, and must be self-sustaining to continue adequate service to the public. Hence, subsidized competition against the railroads by the Government, or by private interests profiting from the use of free facilities furnished by the Government, is not only a moral injustice, but an economic wrong.

"Compensatory rates," as applied to the waterways, would imply that the interests rendering service upon them for hire should make reasonable and just contributions to the capital and maintenance costs of the waterways. These contributions would necessarily be included in the rates, which would, of course, also cover the operating expenses and taxes on the equipment used and the charges upon the invested capital represented by it. The burdens of the subsidies now enjoyed by the patrons of these carriers (including the Government-owned Inland Waterways Corporation) would be lifted from the shoulders of the public and the users would be required to pay the total real costs of the service. The economic soundness of such requirement I do not think can be successfully disputed.

I note that you are under the impression that I am desirous of "perpetuating the rates now in effect," meaning the rates and fares at present charged on the railroads. Let me hasten to assure you that my position is quite otherwise. I fully realize, and have publicly so stated, that, both for the good of the country and of the railroad companies, ways and means must be found in the future for them to carry passengers and haul freight at lower charges than those now in effect.

I see no way in which this can be done except by lessening the waste involved in unnecessary duplication of facilities and service, and destructive competition. Part of the answer, I believe, will be found in the economies and more efficient operation which will be possible under sound railroad consolidations, such as have been proposed for the eastern trunk lines. Another part will be realized by terminating subsidized and unregulated competition against the railroads, the effect of which is to drain away a substantial portion of the most desirable forms of traffic from the railroads, leaving the less remunerative to bear increased burdens in order to support the service required by the public.

A fundamental necessity for carrying on the commerce of the country, and sustaining its social organization, is stable, continuous, dependable, nation-wide transportation service. Up to the present time the duty of performing that service has devolved chiefly upon the railroads. I think there can be no question in your own mind that they must continue for many years in the future to meet a very large part of the Nation's transportation needs, especially for the longer hauls and heavier mass movements of both freight and passengers; also, that anything imperiling their ability to do so constitutes a national menace.

The railroads can not pick and choose their traffic. They must take all that is offered—the less desirable with the more desirable—and to all destinations. They must operate in all weathers, through even the worst storms, if it is physically possible to do so, and wholly regardless of increased costs.

The unregulated truck is bound by none of these restrictions or obligations. It can curtail or cease operations in periods of unfavorable weather. It can take, and does take, the cream of the traffic and refuse that which is less desirable. It can accept a load to a given destination or not, according to the convenience of its operator, the prospect of a return load, or any other purely selfish considerations which may enter into the decision. It can underbid the railroad for the business of one patron, perhaps at an actual loss, and charge another a higher rate for a similar service where there is no effective rail competition. Sniping operations of these kinds are going on every day and are unquestionably increasing. The fact that many truck operators fail through miscalculation of their costs, especially when endeavoring to pay for vehicles out of earnings, does not deter others from immediately entering the field.

The injury done to the railroads, in the effect of net earnings, is greatly out of proportion to the amount of traffic actually diverted because, as indicated, the diversions are for the most part traffic of the most desirable nature. All of this not only tends to make more difficult than ever before the problem of establishing a fair return upon railroad investment and hence stabilizing their credit, but actually threatens to impair the ability of the railroads to render the physical service needed by the public.

Years ago this country learned an unforgettable lesson. It was that if business is to function smoothly transportation rates must possess four definite characteristics: They must be reasonable; they must be nondiscriminatory; they must be stable; they must be publicly known. In those words we sum up the basic reasons which led the country to place the railroads under effective Federal regulation. Only with such assurances as to rates can business men make forward commitments with safety. They can not do so with safety unless they know what their own transportation costs are going to be and those of their competitors.

For more than a quarter of a century railroad rates have answered these characteristics, with inestimably valuable resulting advantages in the carrying on of industry and commerce. Now, the unregulated truck, varying its charges at will, and with no obligations as to publicity for its charges or for treating all patrons alike under like circumstances, is in no small degree bringing back all the evils of secret rates, discrimination, and rebates. In certain industries, where trucking has come to play a large part (whether temporarily or permanently we can not, perhaps, at present say), the resulting disorganization and confusion have become exceedingly serious.

These are all reasons why, from the viewpoint of the public interest, the forms of transportation now unregulated by Federal authority should be made amenable to regulation. It should not be destructive or harmful regulation. It should be fair and just. Its purposes should be to produce as nearly as possibly equality of opportunity in the different fields of transport and purge the country of the returning evils of rebates and secret and unstable rates. Such regulation is absolutely necessary to protect the unregulated forms of transport themselves from destructive competition among themselves.

Let us suppose a group of financiers, joining forces, buy up a bankrupt railroad system for, let us say, the face value of its mortgage bonds, thereby wiping out half or more of its capital liability. Then let us suppose that they propose to operate this system in competition with a solvent and successful parallel and competing line, but on a basis of rates and fares one-third lower. If they were permitted to do so, it is quite likely they might make profits, even very large profits, but they would assuredly bankrupt the other road. We all know the Interstate Commerce Commission would not permit the reduced rates and fares to go into effect, because they would constitute cutthroat, unfair, and unsound competition against a soundly financed and properly managed line and would also demoralize industry and commerce throughout a wide section of country.

I am sure neither you nor any other Member of Congress would approve such a practice in the case of a railroad. Yet exactly this identical thing is done every day in the field of trucking, where the vehicles of bankrupt operators are sold and resold to other operators, who then compete for business upon a basis of rates impossible to be met by rivals who must earn carrying charges upon the normal prices of their trucks. Such practices not only may be but are a serious disturbing factor in the conduct of business by reason of the resulting instability of rates and are an obstacle in the way of placing the trucking industry upon a sound economic foundation.

The transportation act adopted in the early part of 1920 does not deal at all with highway service. At that period commercial highway transportation was a matter of relatively little consequence. But were Congress confronted to-day with the problem of drafting such a comprehensive law it is scarcely conceivable that highway transportation would be left out of the picture. In any event, the intent of Congress was quite clear to establish a public policy of developing a national transportation system for this country. I do not see how that result can ever be accomplished with effective Federal regulation confined simply to the railroads.

I can not share your view that the problem of unregulated competition can be met by withdrawing the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix minimum railroad rates and then allowing the railroads to go in and fight the trucks, busses, barges, and ships to the death, as they would be obliged to do. That would not be mere competition. It would be ruthless, barbarous, industrial warfare. I have no doubt whatever that it would end in the general bankruptcy of the country's entire distribution machinery.

As a practical railroad manager for a good many years, I have, in common with a number of my colleagues, often felt that the railroads were overregulated, and that the activities of the commission frequently crossed the line of regulation into the province of management. I have never at any time, however, questioned the propriety of controlling minimum rates, or doubted that the exercise of that power by the commission has saved the railroads from a repetition of the rate wars among themselves which marked the history of the last century.

Withdraw the power to fix minimum rates and the railroads will be reduced to a choice of one of two alternatives—either secret violations of the antitrust laws or fighting each other, and the trucks, busses, barges, and ships as well, to financial exhaustion. That is exactly the position in which highway and, to a large extent, waterway transport are placed at the present time. It is not healthy for those services themselves or for the country, or, in the long run, for the industries which, like motor-car manufacturing, for example, are dependent upon those services for a considerable part of their markets.

I would think it a distinct step backward to withdraw the principle of minimum rates in application to the railroads. Instead, I think one of the things chiefly needed is to apply the same principle, through regulative authority, to highway and waterway transportation.

I assume you do not question the wisdom of requiring proof of public need and obtaining a certificate of public necessity and convenience before an additional line of railroad can be built. Experience during the days when virtually the entire responsibility for rendering the Nation's inland transportation service fell upon the railroads showed beyond question that needless multiplicity of facilities was, in the long run, a burden upon the public. Does not that inevitably apply with even greater force now, when the advent of other means of transportation makes it so much easier to establish duplicate and multiple facilities and services?

As I see it, there can be only one logical answer to that question, which is that the need is greater now than ever before. It is for that reason that I believe the operators of commercial trucks and busses for hire should be required to obtain permits or certificates of public necessity and convenience before starting business, and that in determining the actuality of the public necessity and convenience to be met the adequacy of existing facilities, whether on the rails or on the highways, is at least an element to be taken into consideration.

I have already referred to the requirement, in the public interest, of maintaining a stable and continuous transportation system to sustain industry and the social organization. An equally important requirement is the maintenance of a stable and continuous marketing system to supply the needs of citizens and their enterprises. Here again unregulated trucking is a disorganizing social force, by reason of the threat which it carries to the ability of the public to rely upon the continued existence of established markets. I have reference to the recently introduced practice of combining truck transportation with the irregular performance of the functions of a merchant.

For example, in an area now extending quite a number of miles from the anthracite coal regions of the State of Pennsylvania, there has very lately grown up an intermittent traffic in coal for household purposes carried direct from the mines to the consumer by truck, the owner or operator of which is also the merchandiser of the coal, purchasing it at the mine and reselling to the consumer. It is an entirely unorganized and haphazard traffic and depends largely upon the existence of special conditions, such as ability to obtain return loads of other merchandise to the mining regions, or vice versa. It has already seriously injured the business of many established retail coal dealers, but has not substituted in their place a dependable and regular source of supply of household coal.

In other instances attention has been called to a practice of trucking manufactured products from an industrial center to a fruit or vegetable growing section. After the industrial products were delivered to the consignee, the truck operator would purchase fruits and vegetables and then peddle them wherever he could find a market; sometimes in the town from which he began his journey—sometimes at other points. This again cuts in on the business of local dealers, threatening their credit and ability to continue their service to their public, but offering no stable or dependable substitute for it.

I think it may well be questioned whether these forms of itinerant trucking, in which the function of merchandising is combined with that of transportation, are really in the public interest. The railroads were long ago forbidden to transport products of which they were the owners. If it is a sound principle to keep separate the functions of transportation and merchandising in the case of the railroads—and I, for one, have no question that it is—why is it not equally sound in the case of other forms of transportation?

I am not an enemy of the truck or bus. On the contrary, I am proud to be counted among their good friends. The railroad with which I am associated participates in extensive truck and bus operations, and we expect to extend their scope in the future, if public demand warrants. We recognize the automotive industry as one of the greatest in the country and fully appreciate the immense traffic which its development and operations have brought, directly and indirectly, to the railroads.

We know that many commercial bus and truck enterprises in private hands are on a sound basis and are profitable, just as we know that many others are not soundly conducted from the viewpoint of the public interest, and in numerous cases are not upon a soundly remunerative basis, because their operators lack the transportation knowledge and experience necessary to compute costs properly. They are a dead weight, tending to drag down both the soundly conducted highway operations and the railroads, and threatening serious injury to both and to the public.

I believe commercial vehicles operated for hire, whether as common carriers or contract carriers, should be regulated as to their rates, practices, and accounting, in manner appropriate to the character of the various services rendered, relying for guidance largely upon the wealth of experience gained in regulating the railroads. I believe this to be necessary for the same reason that regulation of the railroads was necessary, viz, to prevent secret or discriminatory rate making, to assure stability of rates, to protect the adequacy and continuity of transportation service, and, finally, to build up a coordinated national system of transport in which each agency of service shall find incentive for specializing in the particular fields in which it most adequately meets the public needs.

I also believe the regulation of all forms of service crossing State boundaries, should be assigned to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which should be charged with the impartial encouragement of all, in the sound public interest. I hold this view partly by reason of the commission's long background of experience, and partly because I do not believe it possible to create a truly national system of coordinated transport with the regulative authority divided.

I am equally satisfied that fair, properly conducted, constructive, and equitable regulation of all forms of service would give the country, as a whole, a greatly reduced transportation bill, eliminate many uncertainties from the conduct of business, and place every branch of the transportation industry itself upon a sound basis, so as to permit well-managed transportation enterprises, whether large or small, to sustain their credit and make reasonable profits in serving the public.

Again thanking you for your interest, and for the opportunity to discuss the matter with you, I am

Very truly yours,

W. W. ATTERBURY, President.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 13, 1932.

Gen. W. W. ATTERBURY,
President the Pennsylvania Railroad, Philadelphia, Pa.

MY DEAR GENERAL: Your letter of March 15 received and I recognize it as a well-written statement of the difficulties and ambitions of the railroads. I recognize that the railroad business is at low ebb, that you have lost much business to the trucks, busses, and water craft, and that it is your right to take account of the situation and to make an attempt to improve your condition.

Your idea is to put the busses, trucks, and water craft under regulation for a purpose that does not seem clear to me, for you disclaim any idea of raising the rates of these means of transportation as a result of regulation. I am unable to see the value of this regulation to you unless by this means you get rid of the low rates offered by your competitors.

And I venture to say that if regulation of trucks, busses, and water craft comes about the Interstate Commerce Commission will find no way to protect the railroads and advance their revenue except to make rates uniform for all carriers.

This will force rates for busses, trucks, and water craft very much beyond the cost of the service.

I do not know much about the cost of water-craft transportation and it is hardly thinkable that the rates would be raised on water transportation to the level of the rates by rail, but I do know a little about the cost of carrying goods by truck.

A few years ago you took off the milk train which carried milk from my farms and asked me to find another means of transportation and I bought a truck and called at the various farms and delivered the milk. You had been charging me 40 cents a hundred for delivering this milk, and I had to bring it to your stations, and after years of experience I find that I can collect this milk at the farms and deliver it for 20 cents a hundred, which is one-half of your rate.

It is argued by some that the trucks do not have to pay for a right of way and that the railroads do, but to-day this is, at least, a debatable question. The high gasoline taxes and the high license-plate charges have changed that situation. On the main roads, which are the competitors of the railroads, we are spending annually about a billion dollars and these same roads are yielding almost identically that amount from gasoline taxes and license-plate charges so the traffic is paying the entire cost of the main roads.

Should the rates charged by trucks be raised to the rates charged by you? That is the question in my mind—in order to avoid this unfair competition as you call it. I know this increase would not apply to the man who owns his own truck, but it would apply to all those whose business is not large enough or continuous enough to own his own means of transportation.

I would like to draw from my own experience again. I have been connected with a manufacturing plant that was worth many thousands of dollars a year to you, but your rates on short-haul business have been held so high that you have lost a large part of that business. You retain the long-haul business at rates about three times what you charged years ago, but under these circumstances we find ourselves developing plans to split our factory, locating so that practically all hauls will be short hauls, so that trucks can handle the business.

My experience outlined is the experience of everybody.

The regulation of your rates by the Interstate Commerce Commission has made your rates so high that in effect an umbrella is held while your competitors take your business away from you and you are more or less retiring from the field at least of local transportation, both passenger and freight. You are closing up your small stations, discharging your agents at these points, discontinuing both passenger and freight service, and even in the larger stations reducing your force to one-fourth what it formerly was and depending upon your long-haul business for your revenue.

When this revenue proves insufficient you come to the Government and ask for higher rates and secure them. When these higher rates develop diminishing returns you come to the Government and ask it to finance you and this is being done, with adequate security, I hope.

Now, shall we raise all transportation rates to equal yours in the hope of protecting your revenue, or shall we ask you to reduce the cost of running railroads?

In looking up the salaries of the chief executives of the railroads I find they run about $75,000 a year. I suppose your other important officials are paid in proportion.

I find the people you pay by the day are paid $8.53 per day and the people you pay by the hour are paid 64 cents per hour.

Your railroads run through the farms of the Nation and the wage there is $1.35 per day for 10 hours. I do not have the wage scale for other people for whom you haul goods, but just how long can the farmer on a wage scale of 13½ cents per hour pay the one who hauls his product at least 64 cents an hour, and if there is a cheaper means of transportation, shall we take it away from him by regulation?

The railroads of the country are paying out some $400,000,000 a year for executives, officials, and professional men and their assistants who run the railroads.

In addition the railroads have an expensive lobby operating in every State in the Union in order to maintain your advantages, spending many millions of dollars which contributes to your high rates.

At the same time the Government is spending $9,000,000 a year on the Interstate Commerce Commission, and it does, in my mind, the most important work relative to the railroads, because it decides the rates you are to charge for your services, and the Board of Mediation finally decides the wages you are to pay, and the Government itself decides the hours of labor. The work left to you is a matter of keeping the records and operating the railroads. Certainly the need for high-salaried men is reduced by these circumstances.

You are unfortunate in having most of your supplies produced by the steel plants where the wage scale and salary standards are similar to the railroads. Your cars are steel and your rails are steel.

Is not an adjustment absolutely necessary? Higher rates for you bring diminishing returns. Forcing natural competition to accept your rates is certainly unfair to the people of the country. The railroad people are on a platform above other people as a rule, and you receive for your services more than the traffic will bear. You receive more than your share of the value of a delivered article. You are out of line with general conditions, and, to my mind, there is no real remedy except for you to go "pot-luck" with all the people.

Railroad men admit there is no way to haul goods as cheaply as on two steel rails, and the reason you fail is because your entire business-expense structure is away above the general condition of those for whom you haul goods.

There are other lines that are trying to continue on a platform artificially raised above the general level, and an adjustment is necessary in order that a fair exchange of commodities may proceed, or, in other words, this adjustment must take place before the ordinary flow of business is resumed in the United States.

Yours very truly,

CHARLES BRAND.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF KENT v. COYLE

Mr. CLARK of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Elections No. 1 in the contested-election case of Kent against Coyle.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, May 9, 1932, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

Tentative list of committee hearings scheduled for Monday, May 9, 1932, as reported to the floor leader by clerks of the several committees:

LABOR

(10 a. m.)

To amend the act approved March 31, 1931, relating to the rate of wages for laborers and mechanics employed by contractors and subcontractors on public buildings (S. 3847).

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

553. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report dated May 5, 1932, from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on preliminary examination and survey of Agate Bay Harbor (Two Harbors), Minn.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

554. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report dated May 4, 1932, from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on preliminary examination of Bellingham Harbor, Wash., including the Nooksack River, with a view to determining the effect of silt carried by this stream on shoaling in Bellingham Harbor; also with a view to the construction of a breakwater; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. CONDON: Committee on the Judiciary. H. R. 8577. A bill to amend section 95 of the Judicial Code, as amended; with amendment (Rept. No. 1236). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. RAYBURN: Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. H. R. 11677. A bill to amend sections 5, 15a, and 19a of the interstate commerce act, as amended, and for other purposes; without amendment (Rept. No. 1238). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. NORTON: Committee on Agriculture. H. J. Res. 377. Joint resolution making funds available for grasshopper control; with amendment (Rept. No. 1239). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CLARK of North Carolina: Committee on Elections No. 1. A report on the contested-election case of Everett Kent v. William R. Coyle, from the thirtieth congressional district of the State of Pennsylvania (Rept. No. 1264). Referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. BUTLER: Committee on Claims. S. 1705. An act for the relief of Samuel C. Davis; without amendment (Rept. No. 1237). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. JONES: Committee on Agriculture. H. R. 8395. A bill to grant a right of way or easement over lands of the United States within the Upper Mississippi River Wild Life and Fish Refuge to the Savanna-Sabula Bridge Co., a corporation, for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a highway between Savanna, Ill., and Sabula, Iowa; without amendment (Rept. No. 1240). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

SENATE

MONDAY, MAY 9, 1932

The Chaplain, Rev. Zebarney T. Phillips, D. D., LL. D., offered the following prayer:

Most merciful Father, who dost ever draw us to Thyself with cords of love, whose blessings are exceedingly abundant, even more than we know or think; make us to be keenly alive to Thy purposes as again we invoke Thy guidance in the duties of the day. Kindle in each one of us the desire to live nobly, with equal reverence for ourselves and others, with a readiness to be poured out in service, and give us the unconscious radiance of a life animated by the spirit of kindness, that with one heart and mind we may be held under the sway of a supreme passion for the welfare of our beloved country. Help us so to employ our talents that we may be found faithful in all things and receive that blessing which Thy well-beloved Son doth pronounce upon all who love and fear Thee, saying, "Well done, good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." We ask it in His name and for His sake. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Wednesday last, when, on request of Mr. FESS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF BILLS

Several messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On May 6, 1932:

S. 2967. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Randolph, Mo.; and

S. 1047. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to deliver to the custody of the Historical Society of Montana, for preservation and exhibition, the silver service which was in use on the gunboat No. 9, Helena.

On May 7, 1932:

S. 460. An act to give war-time commissioned rank to retired warrant officers and enlisted men;

S. 2396. An act to amend section 11 of the act approved February 22, 1889 (25 Stat. 676), relating to the admission into the Union of the States of North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, and Washington;

S. 2428. An act to provide for the confirmation of a selection of certain lands by the State of Arizona for the benefit of the University of Arizona; and

S. 3953. An act to amend the act approved February 7, 1927, entitled "An act to promote the mining of potash on the public domain."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 336) construing section 503 (b) of the tariff act of 1930, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 283) to provide for conveyance of a certain strip of land on Fenwick Island, Sussex County, State of Delaware, for roadway purposes, and it was signed by the Vice President.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the following-named Senators are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business:

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

UNEMPLOYMENT, TAXATION, AND PROHIBITION—SPEECH BY GOVERNOR RITCHIE

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech recently made over the radio by Gov. Albert C. Ritchie, of Maryland, dealing with three domestic issues—unemployment, taxation, and prohibition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Governor Ritchie's speech is as follows:

THREE DOMESTIC ISSUES TO-DAY—UNEMPLOYMENT, TAXATION, AND PROHIBITION

There are three outstanding domestic issues to-day: Unemployment, taxation, and prohibition.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Of the three, unemployment is the most disastrous in its effects and seemingly the most baffling in its cure. In considering what to do, remember that one great danger of bad times is that they produce bad remedies. We must aim to achieve social justice, of course, but this does not mean that we must try out new and unsound panaceas, or rush headlong into the ways of communism, socialism, or sovietism, or embrace un-American practices like public ownership or unnecessary excursions of Government into the domains of private business, or adopt Government unemployment insurance like the British or German system, or attempt to change the laws of supply and demand.

So, in the present emergency, we should be guided by the sound principle that real relief can never come through governmental doles. It can only come through work.

Industry and Government should join in doing their utmost to create and provide all additional work that can be justified. To the extent this does not suffice to relieve the distress, then by a system of shorter days or shorter hours or both the work there is should, until normal conditions return, be spread out and distributed among the available workers, both employed and unemployed.

If, for illustration only, employment where practicable was on a basis of 30 hours a week, divided, again for illustration only, into 6 hours work per day for a 5-day week, this would definitely relieve unemployment, and might very well be the basis for its elimination.

The only thing necessary to make this proposal effective is the cooperative spirit and the concerted will and teamwork of American industry and Government to do it, the real desire to solve constructively and humanely our present unemployment problem.

There would be some inconvenience and some interference with existing business organizations, but the plan would be for the benefit of society as a whole. It would be to the advantage of industry too, for the burden of continued unemployment will come back on industry in the end, if in no other way, then in taxes.

The proposal has the advantage of squaring with the American ideals of self-reliance and self-help, and of recognizing the right of every American citizen to a job.

TAXATION

What this country must consider in the field of taxation is whether we can afford a National Government which costs the taxpayers $4,000,000,000 a year; whether we can go on with a governmental structure which has grown fifteen times faster than the population and which costs seven times more than in pre-war days, while commodity prices are back at the pre-war level; whether we can spend progressively increasing amounts on government while our national income has been almost cut in half.

In 1913 the combined earnings of the American people were $34,000,000,000, and of that sum $3,000,000,000, or 9 per cent, went to pay the expenses of government—National, State and local.

Last year the combined earnings of the American people were $70,000,000,000, and of that $14,000,000,000, or 20 per cent, went to pay the expenses of government.

Billions are too big to grasp, so put it this way: Out of every $5 the American people earned their governments got $1, and this charge amounted to $466 per family. That is something we can all understand. And with reduced pay checks or no pay checks at all, with failing incomes and falling values, with tax sales and mortgage foreclosures of city home and country farm, we can understand, too, that the burden of these vast governmental expenditures is more than the American people can bear.

The Federal Government's current deficit is on its way to $2,000,000,000, while its accumulated deficit is several billions more. The Government can not go on borrowing to meet such losses without impairing its credit and public confidence in its securities, and new taxes or increased taxes are fast reaching the point of confiscation and diminishing returns.

The time has come when the Federal Government must do what individuals and industry are compelled to do. It must retrench. It must spend less. It must stop taking on new activities. It must cut down to those activities of government which are essential and eliminate those which are not.

This can be done if there is the will to do it. In the fiscal year ended June 30, 1922, the year of the first Republican Budget after President Wilson, the total expenditures of the Federal Government, after deducting certain left-over war explosives, charges for the public debt, and payments to ex-service men was $1,651,000,000. For the fiscal year ended June 30, 1931, the like expenditures with like deductions were $2,155,000,000, an increase of $504,011,000, and there will be a considerable further increase this year.

Time does not permit an analysis of where this vast increase went, but this may be illustrated by what happened in the Department of Commerce, built up by Mr. Hoover himself as Secretary. For Mr. Hoover's first year, 1922, the expenses of this department were $21,688,000. In his last year, 1928, they were $34,383,000, and in 1931 they were $61,477,000, not including the new building erected at a cost of $17,500,000, which constitutes our country's most extravagant monument to bureaucracy.

There is no use saying that this sort of thing can not be stopped. It must be stopped. When business was running full steam ahead and prosperity abounded, our Government was costing us millions and millions of dollars less than it costs us to-day, when business is on part time or on no time and when 8,000,000 people or more want and need work and there is no work for them. It is preposterous that this should be so.

Every unnecessary dollar spent in taxes is more than a burden upon the taxpayers. It means waste and extravagance in government. Such dollars are not devoted to turning the wheels of industry. They are economically inert or lost. And millions of such dollars help drive millions of other dollars into hoarding and tax-exempt securities.

On the other hand, every dollar cut from the expense of Government means not only increased efficiency but also a dollar less in taxes imposed upon American railroads and banks and industry and labor and agriculture, all of which are taxed to the breaking point already.

Without the opportunity of first-hand study and effort, no one mindful of the responsibilities of the situation would say exactly how much could be saved or exactly where. Perhaps it would not be considerable if left to a Cabinet whose members, like Mr. Hoover's, can see no way to retrench in their own departments.

But if given the opportunity I would pledge a Cabinet whose members would realize that the expenses of their departments are not all sacrosanct, and a Budget which would lift from the shoulders of the American taxpayers as a minimum $500,000,000 of the taxes they now pay.

For the future consideration should be given to a permanent fiscal policy which will center the responsibility for a balanced Budget squarely on the President and end the danger of deficits.

The only way to do this is to adopt the Maryland plan. This would require the President to submit to Congress a Budget which would provide for all the governmental expenditures he considered necessary, and which would at the same time supply the funds necessary to meet them. Congress could strike out or reduce items in the President's Budget, but could not raise items or add new ones. Congress would, however, be entirely free to appropriate amounts, or to appropriate for purposes not in the Budget, by the simple method of passing separate appropriation bills which would carry their own special taxes.

In other words, the President's Budget would always balance, because it would furnish the revenues for meeting all the expenditures the President recommended; and Congress would provide the means for meeting any expenditures outside the Budget which Congress chose to authorize.

It is under a budget of this kind that, with other States in the red, their credit gone, and their securities unsalable, Maryland has been able to keep State expenses within State revenues, with a Treasury balance at the beginning of the current fiscal year of one-tenth of the budgetary requirements, with a net State debt of 1 per cent of the assessable basis and with the State's credit authoritatively rated at 100 per cent.

PROHIBITION

Finally, a word about prohibition. My own conviction, as often expressed, is that the eighteenth amendment should never have been put in the Constitution and that, therefore, it should be repealed and taken out of the Constitution and the whole subject turned back to the States, so that each State, within its own borders, may be free to determine the question as its own people will; the Federal Government confining itself to the function of seeing that each State is protected against shipments from other States which would contravene its laws.

Under this system any and all States in the country whose people feel that prohibitory legislation of whatever kind is best adapted to their conditions and problems will be free to have it and will be both undisturbed and protected in their right to be as dry as they want.

But other States whose problems are different, and which are entitled to consideration too, would not be forced to accept a Federal mandate which, while it might work all right elsewhere, would be contrary to what their people found best for their needs and their conditions. These States, like the others, would be free to enact for themselves such laws as in their experience are best adapted to promote temperance, morality, and order among their own peoples.

Think of the restoration of national self-respect and morale, the relief of the young from pitfalls and temptation, the real progress toward temperance, and the reestablished regard for law and order, all of which I am convinced would follow this return to the sound theory of the American Government.

And think of this, too: On the basis of revenues prior to the eighteenth amendment, when 33 States were dry—making no allowance at all for an increase in population of more than 17,000,000 and for other factors—and taking the Government's own figures as to the expense of enforcement, it is clear that the eighteenth amendment is costing the Federal Government at least $532,000,000 a year.

The actual cost is undoubtedly much more than this and is reliably estimated as more than $900,000,000, or nearly the amount of the 1931 Federal deficit.

If national prohibition were repealed and State control substituted, the Federal revenues thus derived would go far toward balancing the Budget. It would be entirely unnecessary to consider many of the emergency taxes which now Congress will have to impose. Indeed, this would be the case if Congress under the eighteenth amendment would legalize light wines and beer.

Bring it home to yourself in this way: The Federal Government is about to charge you 3 cents postage on your letters instead of 2, and is about to tax you on your movie tickets, your checks, your stock transfers and land transfers, your automobile, your radio, and so on. The Government is about to do all this because it must make up the revenue which it lost because of national prohibition. That is what national prohibition is costing you.

Do away with it, and not only will the American people be relieved of these new taxes when they are taxed more than they can stand already, but, in addition to the benefits already referred to, there will be employment for thousands and thousands of people now out of work, new markets will be opened for the farmer, and crime and the gangster and the racketeer will no longer be financed by an outlaw trade, to victimize and prey upon peace-loving and law-abiding citizens.

CONCLUSION

Other matters, of course, concern very vitally the country today, and have their relationship to some of the subjects previously discussed.

One of these is the present tariff, which is really an abuse of the protective system itself, and which must be readjusted—through international negotiations, if necessary—so as to let us do business with the world again. Another relates to the foreign debts, which, I believe, we should not cancel, because that would transfer the burden of what other nations justly owe us to the already overburdened shoulders of the American manufacturer, laborer, and farmer. Still another relates to the railroads, which are so vital to our national prosperity and to the savings and investments of the American people, and which we subject to governmental control on the one hand and to governmental-permitted competition on the other.

But time permits no more. So I close with the conviction that, after all, the virtue we most need to-day is the virtue which brought our country from small beginnings to high estate. It is the homely virtue of faith—faith in American institutions, faith in the worth and integrity of the average American man and woman. Let us maintain that and cherish it, not as an abstract thing, but as the thinking, believing, fighting faith which has realized the promise of American life and fulfilled the dream of American democracy.

RELATION OF DUTIES TO VALUE OF IMPORTS (S. DOC. NO. 91)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the chairman of the United States Tariff Commission, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the relation of duties to value of imports, comparing the average ad valorem equivalents of duties in the year 1929 under the act of 1922 with the average ad valorem equivalents in the year ended September, 1931, under the act of 1930, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

DEPRECIATED EXCHANGE (S. DOC. NO. 90)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the chairman of the United States Tariff Commission, transmitting in further response to Senate Resolution No. 156, present session, information and illustrations supplemental to the basic material submitted to the Senate under date of May 2, 1932, relative to the effect of the depreciation in value of foreign currencies upon the importation into the United States of all of the more important commodities, which, with the accompanying material, was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed, with illustrations, as part of Senate Document No. 90.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Council Grove, Kans., praying for the passage of legislation providing for the cash payment of adjusted-compensation certificates (bonus) of World War veterans, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the fourth district, Department of Kansas, American Legion, of Strong City, Kans., protesting against the passage of legislation reducing the benefits provided by law for disabled ex-service men, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ASHURST presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the Southern Arizona Bank & Trust Co. and United Bank & Trust Co., of Tucson, Ariz., remonstrating against inclusion in Senate bill 4412, the so-called Glass banking bill, of the section providing branches for national banks throughout States of domicile and 50 miles from the home city into neighboring States, etc., which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the Arizona Republic and Phoenix Gazette, by Charles A. Stauffer, of Phoenix, Ariz., remonstrating against inclusion in the pending tax bill of increased postage rates as applied to newspapers, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Gila Bend, Ariz,, remonstrating against reduction in the compensation of Federal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from Delmar W. Sands (on the Tucson-Nogales (Ariz.) postal run), remonstrating against the passage of legislation providing compulsory retirement of railway postal clerks, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from Floyd E. Thomas, lieutenant colonel, etc., president of the Arizona Reserve Officers' Association, Tucson, Ariz., remonstrating against the adoption of proposals to eliminate officers' reserve camps or otherwise curtail the national defense, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial signed by the deans of the separate colleges of the University of Arizona, Tucson, Ariz., remonstrating against cuts in the Army appropriation bill which would cause withdrawal of Army officers and the cavalry unit from the University of Arizona, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from G. V. Hays, post adjutant, John C. Greenway Post, American Legion, of Phoenix, Ariz., remonstrating against cuts in appropriations for the national defense or the removal of Army posts from Arizona, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from H. E. Spencer, president of the Arizona State Federation of Labor, and Oscar Irvin, of Phoenix, and Leslie C. Hardy, of Tucson, all in the State of Arizona, remonstrating against cuts in the appropriations for air mail service, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts presented papers in the nature of petitions from 950 citizens of the State of Massachusetts, praying for the modification of the Volstead Act and the repeal of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented papers in the nature of memorials from 64 citizens of the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the modification of the Volstead Act and the repeal of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a petition from Allan Strachan, of Holyoke, Mass., praying for the balancing of the Budget, the repeal of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution, and opposing payment of the so-called soldiers' bonus at the present time, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented the memorial of Local No. 173, American Federation of Musicians, of Fitchburg, Mass., remonstrating against cuts in the compensation of Federal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a memorial from the American School Citizenship League, signed by its secretary, Mrs. Fannie Fern Andrews, of Boston, Mass., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Oddie bill, being the bill (S. 4080) to regulate the manufacture and sale of stamped envelopes, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Boston, Mass., praying for the adoption of the manufacturers' sales tax in the pending tax bill, the repeal of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution, and the imposition of taxes on wines and beer, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a memorial from the American Writing Paper Co., signed by S. L. Willson, of Holyoke, Mass., remonstrating against increase in the first-class postage rate in the pending tax bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a memorial from Clarence J. Green, of Worcester, Mass., remonstrating against the passage of House bill 7716, providing for charging license fees on amateur radio stations, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REDUCTION OF FEDERAL EXPENDITURES

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I present enrolled resolutions adopted by the board of mayor and aldermen of the city of Manchester, N. H., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution relative to reduction of Federal expenditures

CITY OF MANCHESTER, 1932.

Resolved by the Board of Mayor and Aldermen of the City of Manchester as follows:

Whereas it is the conviction of this board that burdensome taxation, resulting from excessive public expenditure by municipalities, counties, and States, and by the Federal Government is one of the chief causes of the present economic depression and a well-nigh insuperable obstacle to recovery therefrom; and

Whereas cities and other administrative divisions of this country have made and are making earnest efforts to curtail expenditures and thus to assist in securing relief from this oppressive tax burden, even though such economies involve considerable hardship and sacrifice of privileges formerly enjoyed:

Resolved, That this board regards it as imperatively necessary that Federal expenditures at once be drastically curtailed, in the interest of Federal tax reduction, before prosperity can again return to this Nation; and further

Resolved, That members of the New Hampshire congressional delegation be respectfully urged and besought to use their utmost efforts toward the reduction of the Federal Budget, for the reasons above set forth; and still further

Resolved, That the city clerk be directed to transmit a copy of this resolution to each Member of the delegation.

This resolution shall take effect upon its passage.

May 3, 1932. In Board of Mayor and Aldermen. Passed to be enrolled.

DR. DAMASE CARON, Mayor.

A true record.
Attest:

M. J. BRUNN,
Deputy City Clerk.

NOMINATION OF JAMES H. WILKERSON TO BE CIRCUIT JUDGE

Mr. WHEELER presented a telegram from C. R. Vandervort, secretary of Fort Keough (Mont.) Lodge, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MILES CITY, MONT., May 7, 1932.

BURTON K. WHEELER,
United States Senate, Washington.

HONORABLE SIR: In behalf of the members of Fort Keough Lodge, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, and their dependents, more than 400 persons, residents of Miles City, Melstone, Roundup, and Harlowton, Mont., request is made that you oppose the confirmation of Federal Judge Wilkerson to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Seventh District. Records indicate that he is a judge of the extremist antilabor class. His use of the injunction power has been intolerable. The administration of justice depends upon the selection of men for judicial positions who are not class conscious, who do not consciously or unconsciously favor special interests.

RESOLUTIONS OF JACKSONVILLE (FLA.) CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Mr. FLETCHER presented resolutions adopted by the board of governors of the Jacksonville (Fla.) Chamber of Commerce, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Jacksonville Chamber of Commerce has been advised by the Superintendent of Lighthouses, Lighthouse Service, Department of Commerce, that, due to the proposed reductions in appropriation for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1932, thought is being given to the discontinuation of the lights along the channel of the St. Johns River above Jacksonville; and

Whereas statistics showing tonnage shipped indicate conclusively that the savings effected to the public and shippers are many times the economies that could be effected should the lights be discontinued: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Superintendent of Lighthouses be urged to continue in service these lights, so necessary to the commerce on the river.

Copies of this resolution, together with supporting data and communications, to be forwarded to the superintendent of lighthouses, sixth district, Charleston, S. C., and to Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER and Hon. RUTH BRYAN OWEN.

Passed this 6th day of May, 1932, by the board of governors of the Jacksonville Chamber of Commerce, Jacksonville, Fla.

J. H. DANIELS.

Whereas it has been brought to the attention of the military and naval affairs committee of the Jacksonville Chamber of Commerce that the Subcommittee on Appropriations for Military Activities for the year 1933 has made certain recommendations as to the curtailment of the budget of the War Department for the year 1933; and

Whereas, after carefully analyzing these recommendations, it is clear to the committee that if these cuts are carried out as recommended it will mean the total destruction of certain civilian components of the Army: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the committee feels that the elimination of the components as proposed by the Appropriations Committee would be a catastrophe for the Government. The committee feels that the present policy of the War Department as to the activities of these components have been reduced to the very minimum, and can not, with safety to the Government, be further curtailed; be it further

Resolved, That the committee, after studying the recommendations of the Subcommittee on Appropriations for Military Activities, does feel that it is possible to accept the recommendation of the committee concerning the elimination of certain nonmilitary activities of the War Department, but the committee wishes to recommend to the board of governors that it vigorously protest any action on the part of Congress that will tend to destroy and completely eliminate any components of the Army; be it further

Resolved, That the committee is in sympathy with all moves regarding our National Government that will tend to reduce expenses, but reduction should not come from forces of the Government that are charged with the national defense.

Passed this 7th day of May, 1932, by the board of governors of the Jacksonville Chamber of Commerce.

J. H. DANIELS.

Mr. FLETCHER also presented resolutions adopted by the board of governors of the Jacksonville (Fla.) Chamber of Commerce, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas it is reported to this body that in the considered opinion of competent authority, Senate Joint Resolution 139 proposes to repudiate all ocean mail contracts heretofore granted and to prohibit the granting of any further ocean mail contracts; and

Whereas if such purposes be consummated, severe and crippling handicaps would be imposed upon our American-flag services: Be it

Resolved, That the board of governors of the Jacksonville Chamber of Commerce urge the Florida Senators and Representatives in Congress to oppose the passage of this act.

Passed this 6th day of May, 1932, by the board of governors of the Jacksonville Chamber of Commerce, Jacksonville, Fla.

J. T. DANIELS.

Whereas it has been reported through the press that there was under consideration the suspension, for one year, of the operation of all Shipping Board lines; and

Whereas it is the carefully considered opinion of the Jacksonville Port Bureau, acting as a special committee of the Jacksonville Chamber of Commerce, that such action would serve to break down unnecessarily the American merchant marine and would bring comfort to such interests as seek to destroy 100 per cent American lines; and

Whereas the tying up of ships for such a period would incur rapid depreciation and cause expenditures of large sums of money for renovation of such ships for ocean service; and

Whereas it is in the public interest that a strong merchant marine be kept available for use of this country in case of war emergency: Be it

Resolved, That this board urge upon the Secretary of Commerce, the chairman of the Shipping Board, and the Florida Senators and Congressmen to use their best efforts to prevent discontinuance of operation of Shipping Board lines, as proposed.

Passed this 6th day of May, 1932, by the board of governors of the Jacksonville Chamber of Commerce, Jacksonville, Fla.

J. T. DANIELS.

Whereas there are now pending before Congress measures designed to place the river and harbor work of the United States in charge of others than the United States Engineers Corps; and

Whereas the United States Engineers Corps have successfully handled all river and harbor work of the United States for a long period of years with a remarkable record of achievement, honesty, and satisfaction to the American people, and its work is so safeguarded as to remove it from political influence; and

Whereas we believe that no real economy can be effected by removing this work from trained engineers who will still continue in Government service at their regular compensation, even should such a change be consummated; and

Whereas such a change might be the means of politics entering into the river and harbor work, with unfortunate results to the entire river and harbor program of the Nation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Jacksonville Chamber of Commerce urges that no change be made in the present method of handling river and harbor work, and that copies of this resolution be sent to all Florida Representatives in the Congress of the United States and other members of such committees of Congress as these measures may come before.

Passed this 6th day of May, 1932, by the board of governors, Jacksonville Chamber of Commerce.

J. T. DANIELS.

Whereas the operation of air mail between the United States and South America, Central America, and the West Indies is of vital necessity for the promotion of the commerce of the United States, and every consistent effort should be made to continually improve and expand this service, and

Whereas the training of a large number of fliers and the development of improved types of aircraft resulting from the operation of this service is of great value for national defense: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the aviation committee of the Jacksonville Chamber of Commerce, while approving all reasonable moves for economies in the Federal Government, does not favor any further curtailment of the present operations of air lines carrying domestic and foreign mail, which should be operated at the lowest possible cost.

Passed this 7th day of May, 1932, by the board of governors, Jacksonville Chamber of Commerce, Jacksonville, Fla.

J. T. DANIELS.

Mr. FLETCHER also presented resolutions adopted by the board of governors of the Jacksonville (Fla.) Chamber of Commerce, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas it has been brought to the attention of the Jacksonville Port Bureau, a special committee of this body, that the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate has, as the result of its consideration of H. R. 7716, voted to add to this bill an amendment providing, amongst other things, for the collection from each applicant for a license under the radio act of 1927 of a fee for each ship station of $15 per year plus an additional fee of $10 as an administrational charge for handling the application; and

Whereas under the terms of this amendment unreasonable and expensive fees and charges would be assessed to the detriment and hindrance of the development of devices for the protection of human life at sea: Be it

Resolved, That the board of governors of the Jacksonville Chamber of Commerce vigorously oppose the passage of such an amendment of the bill, and that copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Florida Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Passed this 6th day of May, 1932, by the board of governors, Jacksonville Chamber of Commerce, Jacksonville, Fla.

J. T. DANIELS.

Whereas H. R. 9390, placing inland waterway carriers in interstate commerce under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission has been considered by the Jacksonville Port Bureau, acting as a special committee of this body; and

Whereas there is doubt concerning the nature of the jurisdiction which would be conferred upon the commission over such inland-water carriers in interstate commerce: Be it therefore

Resolved by the board of governors of the Jacksonville Chamber of Commerce, That the bill as drafted is not in the public interest and should be opposed; and that copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Florida Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Passed this 6th day of May, 1932, by the board of governors, Jacksonville Chamber of Commerce, Jacksonville, Fla.

J. T. DANIELS.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, from the Committee on Finance, I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

I am not able to file a report this morning, but I expect to file the report on the bill Wednesday morning. I will say also that it was impossible to have copies of the bill placed upon the desks of Senators this morning, but the bill will be printed and a copy will be found on the desk of each Senator on Wednesday morning.

(When filed the report on the bill will be No. 665.)

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. When is it the intention of the Senator to take up the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to take it up Thursday morning, if possible.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. VANDENBERG, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 1930) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across Lake Champlain from East Alburg, Vt., to West Swanton, Vt., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 666) thereon.

Mr. McNARY, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 4262) to provide for the establishment and development of American air-transport services overseas, to encourage construction in the United States by American capital of American airships and other aircraft for use in foreign commerce, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 670) thereon.

Mr. TYDINGS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 571) for the relief of Jennie Bruce Gallahan, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 667) thereon.

Mr. COPELAND, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 4023) providing for the closing of barber shops one day in every seven in the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 671) thereon.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Immigration, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10600) to exempt from the quota husbands of American citizens, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 668) thereon.

PAYMENTS UNDER THE SETTLEMENT OF WAR CLAIMS ACT

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, from the Committee on Finance I report back favorably, without amendment, Senate Joint Resolution No. 97, extending for one year the time within which American claimants may make application for payment, under the settlement of war claims act of 1928, of awards of the Mixed Claims Commission of the Tripartite Claims Commission, and I submit a report (No. 669) thereon.

I ask that a letter from the former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 2, 1932.

The honorable PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith for consideration by the Congress, a draft of a proposed joint resolution to amend the settlement of war claims act of 1928 for the purpose of extending for one additional year from March 10, 1932, the time within which American nationals, who have obtained awards from the Mixed Claims Commission, United States and Germany, or from the Tripartite Claims Commission, United States, Austria, and Hungary, may make application to the Treasury for payment of such awards.

The settlement of war claims act of 1928 originally required that an application for payment of such awards be made within two years from the date of the enactment of that act (March 10, 1928). Due principally to the so-called "late claims agreement" with Germany whereby American claimants were given an additional time within which to file claims against Germany with the Mixed Claims Commission, the act was amended by Public Resolution No. 48, Seventy-first Congress, approved March 10, 1930, providing that application for payment be made within four years from the date of the enactment of the settlement of war claims act. Thus the time limit for making application for payment of awards of the Mixed Claims Commission and the Tripartite Claims Commission will expire on March 10, 1932.

The proposed legislation is believed necessary for the following reasons:

(1) The Treasury holds 67 awards entered in favor of American nationals by the Mixed Claims Commission aggregating, with accrued interest, to September 30, 1931, about $300,000 for which no applications for payment have been received. Thus far the department has not been able to locate some of these claimants. In addition, the Mixed Claims Commission has not yet completed its work, and, in view of the untimely death of Hon. Roland W. Boyden, the umpire, it is not possible to estimate the time required to finish it, but it is almost certain to extend beyond March 10, 1932. The questions pending before the commission involve claims aggregating approximately $40,000,000. If these claims are allowed it is essential that the American claimants concerned be given sufficient time within which to make application for payment.

(2) While practically all of the awards entered in favor of American nationals against Austria by the Tripartite Claims Commission have been paid, the awards entered by such commission against Hungary have not yet been certified to the Treasury for payment because of the provisions of the settlement of war claims act of 1928, requiring the commission at the same time to certify that the funds deposited by Hungary in the Hungarian special deposit account are sufficient to pay such awards. The Treasury has received from the government of Hungary the sum of $8,250 in partial satisfaction of these awards, but that Government can not make further payment until a waiver has been obtained from the government of France of a "most-favored-nation" clause contained in the debt agreement between that government and Hungary. The matter is being actively kept before the Government of France but in view of the uncertainty when favorable action by that government may be forthcoming, it is believed essential that the settlement of war claims act be amended as indicated in the inclosed draft, that is, by extending the time for making application for payment for one additional year.

Respectfully,

A. W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

As in executive session,

Mr. BORAH, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported favorably the nomination of Erle R. Dickover, of California, now a Foreign Service officer of class three and a consul, to be also a secretary in the Diplomatic Service of the United States of America.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Finance, reported favorably the nominations of the following-named persons to be members of the Board of Tax Appeals:

Eugene Black, of Texas, for a term of 12 years from June 2, 1932 (reappointment); and William D. Love, of Texas, for a term of 12 years from June 2, 1932 (reappointment).

Mr. SMOOT also, from the same committee, reported favorably the nomination of Dr. Estella Ford Warner to be a surgeon in the Public Health Service, to take effect from date of oath.

Mr. REED, from the Committee on Finance, reported favorably the nomination of J. Edgar Murdock, of Pennsylvania, to be a member of the Board of Tax Appeals for a term of 12 years from June 2, 1932 (reappointment).

REDUCTION OF GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I introduce a joint resolution to provide for the reduction of governmental expenditures by bipartisan cooperation, and I ask that the joint resolution, which is a brief one, may be read.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 155) to provide for reduction of expenditures by bipartisan cooperation was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, as follows:

Whereas it is imperative that the expenditures of the Government shall be reduced to the end that agriculture, commerce, and industry may be encouraged and revived by diminishing so far as possible the handicap of the excessive load of taxation which is manifestly such as to discourage and in some cases to destroy enterprise; and

Whereas, notwithstanding there is a general desire in the Congress to reduce the public expenditures, there is difficulty in consummating this desire because of the number of plans and the diversity thereof; and

Whereas there is immediate necessity of enacting a revenue act that will tend to raise revenue in a sum that will balance with public expenditures, and it is recognized that additional taxation at this time ought to be reduced to the minimum consistent with the efficiency of administration and the necessities of national defense: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc.,

1. That a committee shall at once be provided, to consist of the President of the United States of America, or a representative designated by him, two Senators, one a Republican, the other a Democrat, each to be named by the President of the Senate; two Members of the House of Representatives, one a Democrat, the other a Republican, each to be named by the Speaker of the House.

2. That said committee shall at once proceed to review the expenditures of the Government and within 10 days of the approval of this resolution shall recommend in detail by departments, independent establishments, etc., reductions in the public expenditures for the fiscal year 1932–33 amounting to not less than $500,000,000 (and as much more as may be practicable) in addition to the $365,000,000 proposed in the President's message to the Congress December 7, 1931, transmitting the Budget for the year ending June 30, 1933. That said committee shall proceed with the view to eliminating unnecessary activities of the Government, the abolishing of unnecessary offices, and the reduction of salaries rather than adding to unemployment by dismissal of useful public officials and employees.

3. That said committee shall prepare and present a bill or bills providing for such reductions as it shall recommend hereunder, and the Congress shall give precedence to their consideration over all other proposed legislation save and except the bill to raise revenue, in connection with which it shall consider such bill or bills.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 336) construing section 503 (b) of the tariff act of 1930 was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

REHABILITATION OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. HOWELL submitted a resolution (S. Res. 210), which was ordered to lie over under the rule, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate request the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry immediately to report a measure or measures having for its or their purpose the constructive rehabilitation of agriculture.

MOTHER'S DAY—ADDRESS BY SENATOR DILL

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, on the evening of May 8, 1932, the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] delivered an eloquent address on the subject of "Mother's Day" over station WRC of Washington, D. C. I submit it for publication in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Senator DILL's address is as follows:

I am glad that the celebration of Mother's Day comes on a Sunday, and that it is a Sunday in the springtime. It comes between Easter, the Sunday when we celebrate the Resurrection, and Memorial Day, the day when we pay tribute to the Nation's honored dead.

On Mother's Day we pay tribute to motherhood and all it includes and represents. Every man and boy away from his mother should write her a letter or send her flowers on that day. The women and girls need not be reminded, because they will do that anyhow.

The glorification of motherhood is not new in human history. Mother worship with its rites and ceremonies, dates back to pagan times, when the people of Asia Minor worshipped the great goddess, Rhea, as the mother of all the ancient gods. "Honor thy father and mother" is a divine command. For centuries in England, the people observed what was known as "mothering" Sunday. It was a day set aside for apprentices and young servants to honor their mothers. They celebrated it with gifts and feasts at the Ides of March, the date that marked the beginning of spring, when all nature awakened to the processes of life.

In this country the people never had any particular date for mother ceremonies as such until 1904, when Mr. Frank E. Hering of Indianapolis, in an address to a large meeting of members of the Fraternal Order of Eagles in the English Theater there urged the observance of Mother's Day. The Eagles lodges all over the country carried out the suggestion and it soon became a national institution. The American people owe Mr. Hering and this great fraternity a debt of gratitude which can only be repaid by a renewed reverence for mothers year by year.

In 1913, Miss Anna Jarvis of West Virginia and later of Philadelphia, started agitation for official recognition of Mother's Day, and in 1914 Congress passed a resolution and President Wilson issued a proclamation setting the second Sunday in May for observance of Mother's Day. Since then the custom has spread to all parts of Europe and to China, Japan, and Africa.

Mother's Day is a day of sentiment. Mothers never asked for it nor expected it, because mother love gives and gives without any thought of receiving anything in return. Rather it is a day for those who are not mothers to make them realize the place which mothers hold in our civilization and the part they play in our country's future.

Nothing could be more fitting than paying tribute to motherhood. Through all the ages, motherhood has been the fondest hope and the proudest boast of woman—the soul and center of her life—a part of the Divine plan of the universe.

It is well that a people who too often scoff at sentiment and pride themselves on their practicality, should reverence this everflowing source of idealism and love which motherhood personifies. It is well, too, that they should never be allowed to forget that to little children, the word "mother" is another word for God, and that no other human being can ever believe so strongly in the possibilities of a little child as the mother of that child.

The progress of mankind can be traced by the progress of woman. In the state of savagery it was woman who provided for and protected her young, while her cave-dwelling consort roamed through the forest or engaged in battle. Tradition tells us that woman first discovered how to start a fire and first developed methods of preparation of skins of animals for protection from the elements. She tamed and domesticated the dog, the horse, and the cow. She was a servant and a slave, and she did these things, because of the human instinct to lessen her labor and better the conditions of her children. Woman invented weaving, painted the first pictures, and crooned lullabies to her children, and thus she planted the first seeds of what we call civilization.

The distinctive feature of our own time is the emancipation and individualism of woman. To-day she has become the peer of man, not only in intelligence, but in social privileges and political power as well. This has become necessary in a democracy like ours where the dangers that beset the home and the family are not in the open but lurk and hide in the results and products of social injustice and industrial greed.

The word "mother" calls to mind sweetheart and wife, lover and husband, children and family, schools and churches. The mother is the fountainhead of the family, whose waters gladden, sweeten, and purify or sadden, embitter, and pollute the world. Just as water can not rise above its source, so no nation can rise above the standards of its home life.

I would not deny or belittle the love which a father has for his children, but no father can love a child as the mother does. The reason for this is found in the Bible: "Where your treasures are, there will your heart be also." The mother invests her life in the child. It is her tenderest treasure as long as she lives.

Her life trembles in the balance at its birth. She spends her force and energy in that infinite care that only a mother can give. She endows it with the wealth of her love. She dreams of what the child is to do and to become. She prays for it long after it is grown, no matter where it goes or what it does. Oh, if only all of mothers' dreams and mothers' prayers came true! What a different world this would be! There would be no more crime, no more exploiting of the poor, and no more war. The mother heart of the world cries out against war to-day as never before. War destroys love and mothers rule by love. War destroys life and mothers create life.

When I think of the mothers in America to-day, I think of them in the homes throughout the land, teaching the children their first lessons of obedience to authority. We can not overestimate the importance of such teachings in this country.

I recall in reading the life of Richard Cobden, the great corn-law leader of England, the story of his visit to America. He traveled all over this country, and when he returned to New York and was about to leave for England, a newspaperman asked him what was the most wonderful thing he saw in America.

Mr. Cobden replied, "The most wonderful thing I saw in America was a country school out west." "Out west," in 1858, was in Minnesota.

"Well, what was so wonderful about that country school out west?" asked the reporter.

Whereupon Mr. Cobden replied, "I saw out there a country school with a woman teacher, who was only a slip of a girl, weighing not more than a hundred pounds, and I saw the pupils of that school, several of them great big farmer fellows 6 feet tall, any one of a dozen of whom could have taken her with one arm and thrown her through the window, obeying her with all the cheerfulness and all the willingness of children of 8 and 10 years of age." Then he added, "I say to you a people who rear their sons with such a sense of obedience to authority are invincible in the civilization of the future."

Mr. Cobden was simply stating an old truth in a new way. That truth is this: The child who is obedient to the authority of its parents at home will more likely be obedient to the teacher and the rules of the school. The child who is obedient to the teacher and the rules of the school will more probably be obedient to the laws of his country in later years.

But I can see these American mothers doing more than simply teaching their children obedience to authority. I can see them teaching the old, old stories of opportunity and hope which have been the boasted heritage of the youth of this Republic since it began as a nation. I can see them sowing the seeds of purpose and ambition in those youthful lives, helping them to weave their first dreams of love and happiness, pointing the way to chances for success and a better lot in life than their parents have had.

If men make our world big, then women make it beautiful. If men provide the food and clothes for the child, women feed the soul. If men are strong, women are skillful. If men make the Nation, women make the home. If we get our ideas of life from our fathers, we get our ideals of life from our mothers.

In all this world there is nothing to compare to a mother's love. Poets, artists, sculptors, all have tried to portray it in artistic creations, but all have failed. It can not be done. It is immortal. It is so Godlike it can not be caught in a materialistic form.

It is the north star of all the many kinds of love that human beings can ever know. It never changes. It is always there, a guiding light after all the storms and earthquakes of existence have passed.

A mother's love is like the sunshine. It illuminates the peak and glorifies the valley. It mirrors the stream, colors the flowers, and beautifies the grass, and yet never disdains to shine on the refuse of the street or the mud of the gutter.

Sam Jones, the great preacher and lecturer, has told a story to illustrate the place which mother love holds in the universe. He said an angel once flew down from the skies to view the beautiful things of earth.

After he visited the mountains and the waterfalls, the fields of flowers and fruit and grain, the lakes and the oceans, he decided to take back the most beautiful things he could carry. He looked about him and saw some beautiful flowers, so he gathered a great arm load of flowers.

Then just before he started, he saw a baby in its cradle looking up at its mother with a beautiful smile. He said, "There's that baby's smile. That's beautiful. I'll take that, too."

Just as he plumed his wings for flight, he saw the great current of that mother's love rushing down into the cradle, and he said, "There's that mother's love. That's beautiful. I'll take that, too."

So with the pretty flowers, the baby's smile, and the mother's love, he flew away to paradise. When he arrived at the pearly gates, he stopped to examine his treasures. He found the flowers had withered and lost their fragrance; the baby's smile had faded; but that mother's love was as constant and as strong as when he left the earth below. So he threw away the withered flowers, he cast aside the baby's smile, and he flew into Heaven with the mother's love, and there at the great white throne of God it reigns eternal still.

In conclusion I desire to repeat a poem by Joaquin Miller entitled "The Bravest Battle That Ever Was Fought":

"The bravest battle that ever was fought,
Shall I tell you where and when?
On the maps of the world you will find it not;
'Twas fought by the mothers of men.

"Nay, not with cannon or battle shot,
With sword or nobler pen;
Nay, not with eloquent word or thot
From mouths of wonderful men.

"But deep in a walled-up woman's heart—
Of woman that would not yield,
But bravely, silently bore her part—
Lo! there is the battlefield!

"No marshaling troop, no bivouac song;
No banners to gleam and wave!
But oh! these battles they last so long—
From babyhood to the grave!

"Yet faithful still as a bridge of stars
She fights in her walled-up town—
Fights on and on in the endless wars,
Then silent, unseen goes down!

"Oh, ye with banners and battle shot,
And soldier to shout and praise,
I tell you the kingliest victories fought
Are fought in these silent ways!

"Oh! spotless woman in a world of shame,
With splendid and silent scorn,
Go back to God as white as you came,
The kingliest warrior born."

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT, as in executive session, laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting several nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

POLICY OF SENATE IN REDUCTION OF APPROPRIATIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 207) submitted by Mr. ODDIE on the 4th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the resolution (S. Res. 197) favoring a 10 per cent reduction by the Committee on Appropriations in the amount of appropriations in the bill (H. R. 9699) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, the resolution before us provides for the rescinding of the former resolution of the Senate which calls for a 10 per cent cut in the appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments below the House bill. I do not intend to go into details at this time in regard to this matter; it has been thoroughly thrashed out on the floor of the Senate for the last few weeks; Senators have heard arguments pro and con on the subject; but I want to say a few words regarding the "high spots" of the controversy.

We all are in favor of the strictest kind of Government economy—I am for it; I am working with my colleagues for it; we are earnest in our desire that the strictest governmental economy shall be brought about; but, Mr. President, we have found, after weeks of study of this matter, that the resolution providing for a 10 per cent cut in governmental expenditures will not bring economy but that it will cause millions of dollars of loss of revenue to the Federal Treasury and the taxpayers of the United States can not at this time stand that loss and should not have to. What we desire is that expenditures shall be reduced wherever possible; I have pointed out, among other things in connection with this bill, that the Secretary of the Treasury has stated that in case this proposed cut shall be made it will be necessary for him to curtail operations and reduce expenditures all down the line, which means throwing many men out of employment. He has shown that if the cut shall be made, as proposed, over 2,000 revenue collectors and agents will have to be discharged. The result will be the loss of practically $95,000,000 of revenue to the Government. So, in order to bring about a saving of about $14,000,000, which will be effected under the 10 per cent cut in the Treasury Department appropriation bill our Government will have to face a possible loss of $95,000,000. We know that customs offices all over the country in the interior States will have to be abolished. That is one of the ways by which the 10 per cent cut may be effected. We have shown that it will not be in the interest of economy or of the Government service if those offices shall be closed.

We have also shown in the case of the Post Office Department appropriations, that if this 10 per cent cut shall be made, it will mean either the cancellation of contracts for ocean mail and air mail, involving a repudiation by the Government of its obligations and contracts—and appropriations bills are not the proper vehicles for taking such action, if it is contemplated—or the discharging of many thousands of Federal employees. It will mean reducing and crippling the service to the people of the United States to a very serious extent. It will hurt the farmers, because their Rural Free Delivery Service will be seriously curtailed. It will mean the throwing out of employment of practically 40,000 Federal employees, both men and women. In this period of distress we can not afford to take such a step by adding largely to the army of the unemployed.

Mr. DILL and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield first to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. DILL. I want to ask the Senator a question. If we rescind the resolution providing for a 10 per cent cut, that will, of course, be a backward step in the matter of the reduction of expenditures. I wonder if the Senator has any assurance from the White House that the Senate will not be attacked as the House has been attacked because we are not saving money as fast as we started out to save it?

Mr. ODDIE. The Senator is evidently under a misapprehension. I do not consider rescinding the previous action of the Senate would be a backward step. I consider it would be a forward step in the interest of economy and in saving money to the taxpayers.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. ODDIE. I will yield in a moment. I have not discussed this matter in detail at the White House as the Senator intimates. This question is one that has been brought up on my own initiative. I believe, after a careful study, that it should be brought up and the action of the Senate ordering a 10 per cent cut in this bill rescinded. It will be a step in the interest of economy. I now yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I think the Senator has already answered the question I was going to ask. I was going to ask the Senator whether or not the proposal of his was in line with the President's so-called economy program?

Mr. ODDIE. I can not say that it is, because I have not discussed this matter with the President, except in a very general way. I will state that last night I told the President I expected this resolution to come up this morning. I do not know whether the President is in sympathy with it or not. Other matters were discussed rather than this one.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. May I ask the Senator if the appropriation bill to which the resolution refers has not been passed upon by the Bureau of the Budget?

Mr. ODDIE. The Bureau of the Budget has passed on this appropriation bill and has cut to the bone the various items. Then the House cut them further. Now, under the action taken by the Senate, there is called for a further reduction of 10 per cent below the Budget figures and below the House figures.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator is aware that the Budget is entirely in control of the executive department of the Government, and if the President since he sent the bugetary message to the Congress has come to the conclusion that the Budget estimate was a mistake, would it not be a good idea to turn all the appropriation bills back to the Director of the Budget in order that he may revise these requisitions in a businesslike and orderly way?

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I do not know what the President desires in regard to this bill. I know he has stated that it will be a wicked thing to discharge a large number of Federal employees.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, when did the President make that statement?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield; and I will ask the Senator to repeat his question.

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator to tell us when and where the President of the United States made the statement which the Senator now has put into his mouth about the wickedness of the course being pursued?

Mr. ODDIE. The President has told me, I heard him state that he thought it would be a wicked thing for thousands of Federal employees to be turned out of employment, because they are giving their lives to the service; and he thought it would be a grave mistake if they should be turned out.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why did not the Senator say to the President that it was not the purpose of the promoter of the 10 per cent reduction in appropriations, in the Senate, at any rate, to discharge employees, but the purpose was to reduce expenditures, especially such expenditures as the subsidies that are now being paid? Why did not the Senator inform the President of that fact?

Mr. ODDIE. Because this question was not before the President at that time, and it was not my place to do it. I was with several other Members discussing with the President various questions, in a very general way, and we did not come to the point of discussing this bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield further to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator say whether or not the President is in favor of the motion the Senator is now advocating—that is, to rescind the action taken by the Senate ordering a 10 per cent reduction in the appropriations? Is the President in favor of the Senator's resolution?

Mr. ODDIE. I have not the slightest idea what the President of the United States thinks about it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Did not the Senator ask the President whether or not he was in favor of rescinding the action taken by the Senate?

Mr. ODDIE. No; because it is something the President has nothing to do with.

Mr. McKELLAR. The President is giving out interviews every day in favor of economy, and here is a motion of the Senator to do away with bringing about economy, at least to the extent of 10 per cent. Is it possible that the Senator discussed the question with the President and did not get an idea from the President as to whether or not the President is in favor of his motion or against it?

Mr. ODDIE. No; because very general things were discussed, and I do not know how the President feels about the pending resolution.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. COUZENS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. ODDIE. The Senator from Nebraska was first on his feet, and I yield to him.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator a question. How in the world can we be expected to follow the ideas of the President if we do not know what he thinks about this motion?

Mr. ODDIE. The Senate is an independent body.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; it is not.

Mr. ODDIE. That is a matter of opinion. I feel that we have a right to our own individual opinions and a license to do as we think best.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator did not dare tell the President that, did he? [Laughter.]

Mr. ODDIE. It was not necessary for me to tell him that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will not the Senator be good enough——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. ODDIE. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will not the Senator be good enough before he asks for a vote on his resolution—and we will probably not dispose of it in a day—to have a conference with the President and find out whether or not the President is in favor of the Senator's resolution?

Mr. ODDIE. No, I will not; because I consider myself an independent factor in this matter. I belong to the legislative branch of the Government, and, as I respect the President of the United States, it is not necessary for me to discuss this matter with him. The resolution has been offered on my own motion.

Mr. KING. I understood the Senator to say a moment ago that he did discuss this matter with the President last night, but that the President did not commit himself. Why was the Senator conferring with the President? Was it for the purpose of ascertaining his views, or was the Senator anxious to convey his views to the President?

Mr. ODDIE. No, Mr. President; I did not say that. I said that in a general discussion on ways in which economy can be brought about in a practical manner this subject was mentioned very briefly. I do not know the President's opinion regarding this resolution, however, and I did not ask him, because he may not agree with me; I have a perfect right to bring up this matter irrespective of his opinion.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. I appreciate the frankness of the Senator from Nevada; but I am wondering if anybody on the other side of the aisle knows where the President stands on this resolution.

Mr. ODDIE. That is a very broad question. I do not want to get far afield in this matter. We are discussing one problem; and I hope we can have a vote on this question. It has been before the Senate for weeks. We want to get down to business on other matters after this is disposed of. If we can get a favorable vote on this matter, the Senate Appropriations Committee can get together without having its hands tied, and write into this bill certain practical economies which will be effective.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], as I have said before, is earnest and sincere in his effort to bring about real economy. We may not agree as to certain of the methods of procedure, but he is on the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, and he will be active in the matter. When the bill is written up as the subcommittee feels that it should be written up, it will be brought to the Senate in whatever form it may be, and the Senate can attack it and tear it to pieces if it chooses in any way it wishes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that I am on the subcommittee and on the full Committee on Appropriations, and I shall be very happy to go into this matter. I do not see why in the world the Senator does not call his subcommittee together and let the subcommittee pass upon these questions. We did that in the other cases. Why is it that we balked at the Treasury and Post Office Departments?

Subcommittees of the Appropriations Committee have already passed upon five departments. They have already made a 10 per cent reduction in five departments. Why are the Treasury and Post Office Departments to be excepted from the rule we have already applied in the Interior Department, the State Department, the Commerce Department, the Labor Department, and the Department of Justice? Why not go on? What is keeping the Senator from calling the subcommittee together?

It has been probably two weeks since we had a meeting. All of a sudden the meetings just stopped, right short off. Another meeting has not been called. We have had no further hearings. There are one or two witnesses still to come before the subcommittee, but the Senator will not call it together. He wants to stop the whole works. Why not let the Committee on Appropriations pass upon this matter? I think that is the only thing to do under the circumstances.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, after careful study I have found that in the case of this particular bill the 10 per cent cut can not be made without doing serious injury to the governmental services in question and to American industry and the American people, and that tens of thousands of men will have to be discharged and thrown into the army of the unemployed. I do not think we should have a hand in a thing of that kind.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada further yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the Senator trust his colleagues on the committee? There are both Democrats and Republicans on it, and all of them are high-minded men. They want to do the right thing, the fair thing, the square thing, and the thing that is just and proper under the circumstances.

Has not the Senator any confidence in his colleagues on the committee? Can he not discuss the subject with them? Can he not bring us together and let us pass on the matter, or let us talk about it, at any rate, and see what we can do? Why does the Senator want to rescind the action already taken by the Senate, simply on his own judgment? Why is he not willing to trust it in part to his colleagues on the committee?

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I have implicit confidence in my colleagues; and I have too high a regard for them to put an impossible, inhuman task up to them—because this is an inhuman task. Throwing 40,000 Federal employees, men, and women, out on the streets—which we will have to do in this case, in my opinion—I do not think is the right thing to do. I feel that the Senate will change its view about the matter.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. Let me say to the Senator from Nevada, as a member of the Appropriations Committee, that I am anxious to cooperate with the President of the United States in making further economies. I should like to know whether the Senator, as a result of his conferences, can tell us, should we vote for the Senator's resolution, whether it will receive the approval of the President, or whether we will be charged with not cooperating with him in economizing in Government expenditures?

Mr. ODDIE. I will say frankly to the Senator that I do not know. The President may feel one way about the matter and I may feel another way about it.

Mr. BYRNES. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. ODDIE. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES. Does not the Senator think that in justice to his colleagues in the Senate he should not ask us to refuse to vote for the 10 per cent cut when we may thereby bring down the criticism of the President upon us? Will not the Senator communicate with the President, find out what he wishes, and let us know? If he is in favor of 15 per cent, I will vote for it.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I do not think it is fair to tie me up in a proposition of this kind. I do not think it is necessary for me to ask the President. If we follow our own consciences in this matter, and do something that we think is the wise and proper thing to do, I do not think we have to look further for approval.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The propositions underlying the effort to diminish Government expenses are associated with difficulties; and I think that fact has come to the consciousness of all of us. I am wondering if an arrangement could not be effected to set up a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations with authority to deal with the entire problem.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I feel that a subcommittee can do very efficient and useful work after studying this entire problem; but——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. ODDIE. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I feel like saying to the Senator that after all the time the Senate has spent in the discussion of these various amendments, and after the action that has been taken, in my judgment it is wholly impractical now to pass this resolution. I content myself with that statement at this time.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Personally, I trust very much that the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas may be agreed to. The legislative appropriation bill came over from the House with the economy program attached to it as an amendment. That bill is now pending in the Appropriations Committee and can be dealt with by that committee. It can be separated from the bill and made an independent matter if desired. If a subcommittee can be appointed, consisting of an equal number of Democrats and Republicans, to deal with the economy program in a nonpartisan way and then have it reported to the Senate by the committee, I believe that is the best way to deal with the problem at the present time.

I heartily concur in the suggestion made by the Senator from Arkansas. I deem it to be a very wise one.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. There was so much noise in the Chamber that I did not understand the proposition which was submitted by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It has not been definitely worked out. My suggestion was that a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations be authorized to study these various proposals and to suggest others and to make a report upon the matter. I am not suggesting that as a substitute for this resolution, because the plan that I have in mind would require some consideration to work out the details.

Mr. BORAH. The suggestion is that the Committee on Appropriations appoint a subcommittee to deal with the economy program?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And, if necessary, that the Senate define the jurisdiction of the committee. The committee perhaps now has power to deal with the matter if it chooses to do so; but I do not see how the Senator from Nevada can expect the Senate to rescind the action it has deliberately taken on a number of these bills, and, for my part, I shall vote against his resolution if it comes to a vote.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield further to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. If a subcommittee is appointed, as has been suggested, I think the subcommittee ought to bear in mind that very much of this economy program so far, and much of the economy program that is in the economy bill, is a mere postponement of the day of appropriation. If we are going to have an economy program, let us have an economy program—something that entirely eliminates the expenditures of government instead of merely postponing them for an emergency appropriation bill. It is more or less a shame to cut expenses now unless we are going to eliminate the things which demand or require expenditures.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Committee on Appropriations is really the committee to bring about these reductions. When it comes down to the last analysis, if there are any reductions they will have to be reported by the Committee on Appropriations. That must be clear to every Senator.

Under the rules, the Committee on Appropriations delegates to various subcommittees the duty of passing on appropriations first, before they are reported to the full committee. That is all we are doing under this procedure. That is what should be done. The matter should be left to the Appropriations Committee.

For instance, under the rule the so-called economy bill, which is attached to the legislative bill, has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The subcommittee can take the recommendations made in that bill and utilize them in bringing about a reduction of expenditures. In my judgment the only possible way in which we can make a real saving is for the Committee on Appropriations to pass on the matter, because they have the power to do it; and when such proposals are passed on by the committee, as we have already seen, they are enacted into law.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas suggested that the Senate define the jurisdiction of the subcommittee. I was talking this morning with one who I think knows as well as anyone about the Government, and after my conversation I was convinced that very little economy has been accomplished or will be accomplished in this economy bill——

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. BORAH. For the simple reason that we are simply postponing the time for appropriations. We are not eliminating the institutions or bureaus which make necessary the appropriations. We are simply postponing appropriations at the present time. If the institutions or bureaus remain, the appropriations must come.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I imagine the Senator from Idaho has in mind the appropriation for the Boulder Dam. That is the only one which, I think, comes within the category of which he speaks. In my judgment, there will not be an appropriation for the Boulder Dam in the deficiency bill. I just do not believe there will be.

We are in this attitude, so far as this particular bill is concerned. Here is the chairman of the subcommittee, who refuses—and I mean no disrespect to him at all, because he feels he has the right to do it—who refuses to call the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations into session for the purpose of considering the matter even; and while he is refusing even to meet with his associates on the committee to discuss the matter with them as to how the reductions could be made, he comes with this resolution to rescind the former action of the Senate. In my judgment, if the Senator from Nevada would call his subcommittee together within two or three days, or three or four days at the outside, the subcommittee would report to the Committee on Appropriations, and that committee would report to the Senate a bill which the Senate would be glad to deal with. I assure the Senator from Idaho and every other Senator here that it would mean a real reduction in the expenditures of the Government, and not a fancied one.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I want to make a statement, because several statements have been made in the last few minutes which should be answered.

I have not called the subcommittee together because I felt that it would be working against the tide. This impossible resolution of the Senator from Tennessee—he did not offer it with any other object than to bring about intelligent economy—this impossible resolution has tied the hands of the subcommittee. It can not make the reductions directed without seriously crippling the Federal Government activities and throwing thousands of men out of employment and doing serious injury to industry. We can not afford to do a thing of that kind to-day. It is inhuman, and it is uneconomical.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I find myself in accord with the suggestion made by our leader on this side, and I want to point out to him and to others that the Committee on Appropriations can not proceed in any scientific and businesslike manner to reduce the total appropriations, those appropriations which are included in all the bills, if requested in each instance to take 10 per cent from a pending bill.

This is what I have in mind. There is recommended in the Treasury appropriation bill the expenditure of $108,000,000 for public buildings, and by reason of the Tydings resolution the committee can not touch that appropriation; it must be left intact. It might well be that if we took all the appropriations and considered them together we could make not a 10 per cent reduction in the aggregate but perhaps a 15 or 20 per cent reduction.

It is a change of heart on my part; but I am convinced that we can not build $100,000,000 worth of public buildings this year, and we can reduce the Budget substantially. Then, besides that, if the Committee on Appropriations were left to consider all the bills, it might well be found that 50 per cent could be taken from one and 1 per cent from another.

If the committee were freed from restrictions and authorized to proceed with reference to all the appropriation bills, I believe we could bring back to the Senate measures which would bring the relief which we wish, and that the reduction would not be 10 per cent, but might be much in excess of that. But if the committee having in charge the Post Office and Treasury appropriation bill is prohibited from taking anything from the public-buildings appropriation, and told to take 10 per cent from what is left, there must come inequities, as suggested by the chairman of the subcommittee.

I would be very glad, myself, if the Senator from Arkansas could formulate a resolution directing the Committee on Appropriations to consider all the appropriation bills; and the agricultural appropriation bill must be considered along with the others, because it was passed before any cut was proposed. The Committee on Appropriations, authorized to consider all the appropriations, might very well bring in a bill which would effectuate the economies which we all desire.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In addition to what I have already said, it seems pertinent to remark that such a committee as I have suggested might find it necessary to recommend legislative provisions in order to facilitate the economies which they think are sound, and that one group could recommend a policy which might be made applicable throughout the Government. I have no pride of opinion about the matter. We all look to the same end, but look in so many different directions that my fear is that we shall not see anything at the same time, and that the result will be failure.

Undoubtedly there are sound economies which can be inaugurated. The difficulty is to find them and to find the best way of putting them into effect. We are not going to accomplish any substantial reductions in Government expenditures without some violent opposition from certain sources.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ODDIE. In just a moment. Referring to what the Senator from Arkansas has just said, if my resolution is adopted, the Committee on Appropriations will not have its hands tied. I can not see any objection to adopting the resolution. There are impossible provisions in the resolution under which we are instructed to proceed now. If we pass my resolution, the committee will be free to act intelligently. Then, when economies are suggested, they can be applied to this particular bill under consideration, and I know the committee has many economies in view which can be applied to the bill now pending. But now its hands are tied.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I want to ask the Senator whether at the Republican caucus last night at the White House a nonpartisan tax bill or nonpartisan economy plan was agreed upon?

Mr. ODDIE. That was suggested, in view of the seriousness of the economic condition to-day, but nothing was agreed on, that I know anything about. A general discussion went on. There was no caucus.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think it was quite fair and quite ethical for the Republicans to have a caucus at the White House and agree upon a nonpartisan plan for economy and then come and suggest it to us as a nonpartisan plan which we must follow?

Mr. ODDIE. It was not a caucus, and I did not agree to anything and did not hear anything agreed to; and I do not think that the question should be brought up in this way.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator knows that if his resolution shall be agreed to it will be a blow to the economy program of the Senate as developed thus far. Is the President in favor of striking down economy?

Mr. ODDIE. I do not know about the President's viewpoint in regard to this resolution. I am speaking as an individual, as a Member of the Senate. I consider that this 10 per cent cut in this bill is not an economy program. Anything that will result in saving a certain number of millions to the Government and costing the Government several times that number of millions is not an economy program.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I am not disposed to object to the suggestion offered by the Senator from Arkansas, but I would like to inquire, in the event the Senate should adopt his suggestion, what assurance have we that the chairman of the subcommittee thus constituted will not assume the extraordinary jurisdiction which the chairman of this subcommittee has assumed, to say whether we shall meet and consider these matters or not? I would like to know when the Senate conferred jurisdiction upon the chairman of any of its subcommittees to say, despite the opinion of his associates to the contrary, that a thing is impossible, and that to accomplish it would be "brutal." The only thing of a brutal nature I know anything about as having been suggested, has been suggested by two Cabinet officers who appeared before the subcommittee, and who have started propaganda, and who have insisted that the curtailed expenses would involve a discharge of nearly 50,000 employees.

I deny that there is a word or a suggestion in any action taken by the Senate that involves the dismissal of a single employee, and I do not think that the chairman of the subcommittee has a right to assume complete jurisdiction of this problem, and to say to his associates that they shall not convene to consider the various aspects of it.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BINGHAM in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I am shocked at what the Senator from Virginia says. I assumed that the Senator from Nevada was speaking for his subcommittee. I had not been able to be here because of Finance Committee meetings, but now I am confronted with the proposition that one single individual, one Senator on an Appropriations subcommittee, asserts the power to speak for the full subcommittee. Am I correct in that?

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I am being misinterpreted in this matter. I am chairman of a subcommittee, and it is up to me to decide when that subcommittee will meet.

SEVERAL SENATORS. No, no!

Mr. ODDIE. That subcommittee has had meetings for many weeks and I have already called attention to the large amount of work that has been done by it. In the meantime I have been gathering data for the use of the subcommittee. I have presented those data to the Senate, and I have assumed, and I think rightly so, that the Senate will not fly in the face of something that is impossible and impracticable. I have done a great deal of hard work in getting these data, and I refer the Senator to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for much of the material.

Mr. COUZENS. I am not speaking about what work the Senator has done, but I am trying to find out whether this proposal of the Senator is his individual proposal, or the proposal of the subcommittee of which he is chairman.

Mr. ODDIE. It is my individual proposal.

Mr. COUZENS. In other words, the Senator wants the Senate to act on this resolution of his without any committee action whatever?

Mr. ODDIE. I have requested that.

Mr. COUZENS. It is the most astounding proposal I have ever heard.

Mr. ODDIE. The Senator has not been here as long as some of the rest of us. The Senator, with his great responsibilities, his great wisdom and knowledge, and the hard work he is doing in connection with his duties in the Senate, has not had the time, evidently, to study the various problems involved as he should have.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will admit, however, that he voluntarily stopped any meeting of the subcommittee, and there have been no meetings of the subcommittee for the last two weeks, all on account of the particular proposal the Senator now has in mind. Is not that true?

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I have found that the data which have been placed before the subcommittee will make it impossible for the committee to make the 10 per cent cuts in this bill without seriously injuring the service and throwing thousands of men and women out of employment.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I assert that no data have been presented to the subcommittee. The Senator from Nevada has what he alleges to be data, and we have not been enabled to examine them to see whether they are accurate or inaccurate.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, plenty of the data have been placed in the RECORD to substantiate all the statements I have made, and I refer the Senator to those data. The published reports of the subcommittee contain that data. The Senator knows it. He attended the meetings where they were presented.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator—and it is not in any offensive sense at all—whether the Senator has not refused to convene the subcommittee in order that he might, by preventing action, force through the Senate this resolution which he has proposed?

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I have not refused anything. It has been suggested by one of the members of the subcommittee that meetings be called, but that is all I can remember of such a request or suggestion. I do not think any other Member has suggested a meeting.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have suggested quite a number of them.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. ODDIE. I will yield to one Senator at a time.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield first to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have been very much impressed with the high-class and able and enlightening discussion on the general subject which took place in the House of Representatives on Saturday. Among the statements made there, which I have no reason to doubt, was one that there are 150 bureaus now operating in the Government, created or grown up as the years have gone by, and that at least 50 of them are without constitutional warrant or authority. That statement was made by one of the able Members of the House, a gentleman of high standing, who has served in an official position under three administrations of the Government, and he is consequently familiar with the subject which he was discussing.

The program with which we are dealing here does not seem to get us anywhere, as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] suggested a while ago. It simply means a postponement of appropriations to a very large extent, it seems to me. But if we want to get some real economy, if we want to have some real practical basis of adjustment, we ought to deal with the superfluous and unnecessary bureaus which have been established from time to time. I am wondering if the committee has been considering that problem at all. It seems that at least 50 bureaus now operating out of 150 are without constitutional warrant.

Mr. ODDIE. The Appropriations Committee has no authority over those matters. I am satisfied many effective economies can be accomplished, and I think should be; but that is beside the point now under discussion. The Appropriations Committee can not exceed its authority.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I think we are all anxious to complete the routine morning business. I am going to ask the Senator from Nevada and other Members of the Senate if they will not agree by unanimous consent to postpone further consideration of this matter at this time.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the discussion continues until 2 o'clock the resolution will go to the calendar. Why not let it go to the calendar now and take its regular place? I am willing that that should be done.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to suggest to the Senator that the resolution be referred to the committee of which he is chairman, the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. The charge has been made that the committee has not had any opportunity to consider these matters. The committee can then refer the resolution to a subcommittee if it desires to do so. Why not meet these objections by letting the resolution now pending be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads?

Mr. ODDIE. But this is a matter pending before a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. NORRIS. All right; then let us refer it to that committee.

Mr. ODDIE. I have no objection to that, because I want to give everyone on that committee an opportunity to be heard and to express himself. That subcommittee has studied these questions at length.

Mr. McNARY. Then I ask unanimous consent that the pending resolution be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ODDIE. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and the resolution is referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have a motion which I should like to submit at this time and have referred to the Committee on Appropriations together with the resolution which has just been under discussion by the Senator from Nevada. If I may be heard, I would like to state briefly the purpose of the motion. It is that in lieu of all previous instructions the Senate request the Appropriations Committee to review all the appropriation bills collectively and bring back a report which aggregates at least 10 per cent reduction over the total of the bills passed by the House.

The purpose of the motion, of course, is to give the Appropriations Committee latitude. They may find that 50 per cent is the amount they can take out of one appropriation, 25 per cent out of another, and perhaps not more than 4 or 5 out of a third; but at least the Appropriations Committee should have latitude enough to review the matter in a full and fair way. The purport of the motion, as I said, is that in lieu of all previous instructions the Senate request the Appropriations Committee to review all of the appropriation bills collectively and bring back a report which aggregates at least a 10 per cent reduction over the total of the bills passed by the House. It will accomplish exactly what we have in mind. We shall get a 10 per cent reduction in the aggregate and it will give the Appropriations Committee some latitude.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am glad to hear the able Senator from New York make clear the purpose of his resolution. Over a month ago I tried to point out that a 10 per cent reduction on all appropriations was like trying to fit a bill into a Procrustean bed. It can not be done. The philosophy of the Senator from New York is correct. I can name appropriations that ought to be cut 50 per cent, and I did name some of them. I can name some that should be cut 80 per cent, and I can name some that ought to be increased 10 or 20 per cent. I think the Senator from New York has pointed the way to a solution of the matter, leaving the committee at liberty to exercise their discretion to make such cuts, so that in the aggregate it may be done rather than by a 10 per cent arbitrary reduction.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask that the motion be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the motion being received and referred as requested by the Senator from New York? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The motion was reduced to writing in the form of a resolution (S. Res. 209) and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, as follows:

Resolved, That in lieu of all previous instructions regarding appropriation bills the Committee on Appropriations is hereby requested to review all the appropriation bills collectively and bring back a report which aggregates at least a 10 per cent reduction in the total of the bills as passed by the House of Representatives.

AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senate to a news item which appeared in the public press of my State on May 4:

OLD EWES SELL AT A DIME EACH—WARN SHIPPERS

Shippers and feeders of sheep were warned by the Omaha Live Stock Exchange to send no more old ewes to the Omaha market Tuesday, when 58 head sold for 10 cents each. This was the lowest price ever paid for sheep on the Omaha market. When the figure dropped to 10 cents a ewe one commission firm reported to the exchange that it had refused to accept one carload of aged ewes.

Prices of this class of sheep have been steadily declining for several months. Six weeks ago, when 400 of them brought only 35 cents a hundred, it was thought they would go no lower.

That gives a notion of the situation existing in the agricultural sections of the country. Think of a farmer shipping sheep to market and finding he can only get 10 cents apiece for them.

Here is a letter from a man who has been time and again the mayor of one of the conservative and heretofore prosperous little cities of about 5,000 inhabitants in the midst of one of Nebraska's best farming regions. He said in part:

When you consider that sheep were sold in Omaha at 10 cents per head, and that commission men refused to accept one carload because they wouldn't bring enough to pay the freight, and a farmer from near Thayer, who shipped to Omaha 39 sheep, had to send $2 to pay the balance of the freight and other expenses, and to-day old corn, if it were shipped from this county to Chicago, would not bring over 8 cents per bushel, and oats about 7 cents, and the very best hogs are only bringing $2.75 per 100, you can realize what a hopeless condition the majority of the people are in and the frame of mind they are in against the people at Washington. Not a day goes by but people come to the door begging for work or a bite to eat. Drove yesterday with Mr. ——— to Clay Center, Fairfield, and Harvard. He was looking after some farm mortgages * * * and the parties could pay neither the interest nor taxes. The sooner the Farm Board goes out of business the better. The taxpayers will never get a dollar back of the Farm Board money, and it will be lucky if it don't ruin everyone who has money borrowed from them.

He ends with this statement:

I am not lying or joking, HOWELL. Conditions are deplorable.

That is the situation with which we are confronted in the agricultural regions of the country to-day.

Last Friday I called the attention of the Senate to the alarming rate at which farmers have been losing their farms and their homes. Not only have the foreclosures and forced sales of farms greatly increased in number, but the farmers' basis of credit has been wiped out entirely in a great many instances, and in many other cases greatly impaired. This has been due almost entirely to the enormous decline in the prices of farm products, which in turn have forced down the values of farm land and farm buildings.

Since the farmer obtains most of his credit with the collateral of farm land and farm buildings and the value of the products of the farm, his basis of credit rises or falls as the value of his collateral rises and falls. Farm prices have dropped from 205 in 1920 to approximately 60 at the present time. The values of farm lands have shrunk $22,000,000,000 since 1920, while taxes have mounted rapidly to a level of two and one-half times the pre-war level, and the farm-mortgage debt has increased to a total of nine and one-half billion dollars.

The difficulty of farmers obtaining necessary credit to continue farming operations is strikingly shown by recent data issued by the Federal Farm Loan Board. During the first three months of 1932 the Federal farm-loan system, embracing the Federal land banks, the joint-stock land banks, and the Federal intermediate-credit banks, extended 26 per cent less credit than during a similar period in 1931. The total amount of credit extended by all these institutions during the first three months of 1932 totaled $64,074,000, compared with $86,847,000 during a similar period of 1931. In the first three months of 1932 the Federal land banks advanced $5,507,000, as compared with $15,809,400 during a similar period in 1931, or a decrease of 65 per cent. The joint-stock land banks advanced only $887,800, compared to $2,013,800, or a decrease of 55 per cent. Intermediate-credit banks advanced $57,679,153, compared with $69,024,231, or a decrease of 16 per cent.

Couple with this situation the fact that a large number of small banks in the rural communities and towns have closed their doors and are no longer able to extend credit and some idea of the gravity of the situation may be gained. In many farm communities there is no longer any local credit agency, except the limited resources of individual lenders. The local bank has either failed or closed its doors and other lending agencies have stopped lending. In other communities where the local bank is still open for business its credit facilities are sharply curtailed.

During the period 1921 to 1931, inclusive, there was a total of 9,285 bank suspensions. Most of these were small banks in rural areas and small towns. Out of the total of 9,285 bank suspensions for the entire country, 36.47 per cent, or more than one-third, were in towns of less than 500 population; 56 per cent, or more than one-half, were in places of less than 1,000 population; 65.66 per cent, or nearly two-thirds, were in places with a population less than 1,500; and 74.34 per cent, or slightly less than three-quarters, were in places with a population of less than 2,500.

I request, Mr. President, unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a table showing the bank suspensions for the period from 1921 to 1931, inclusive, as reported by the Federal Reserve Board.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). Without objection, that order will be made.

The table is as follows:

Bank suspensions, by size of town or city, 1921–1931

Places with population of—	Number of suspensions

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, one reason why more loans are not being made to farmers is that the farmer has lost his basis of credit. Banks and other lending institutions naturally will not lend money to any individual unless he has satisfactory collateral to offer as security. A great many farmers, due to the slump in value of farm land, are no longer able to offer any security for additional credit. Others who could offer satisfactory security are reluctant to do so and to place themselves deeper in debt when the prices of farm products are so low that there is little prospect of making any profit, while the prospect of incurring a loss is much greater.

For several years, farmers have been eating into their capital investment, borrowing money to refinance previous debts and cover losses. The only way the farmer has to repay a debt is to produce something from his farm, but under existing prices he is unable to secure enough from his products to pay even the cost of production. Consequently, he has suffered from cumulative losses.

This is reflected strikingly by data compiled by the Federal Farm Loan Board from applications of borrowers in connection with loans submitted by Federal land banks to the board. In 1931 these applications showed that 57.7 per cent of the proceeds were used to pay off mortgages and other liens; 22.2 per cent to pay off other debts; 8.6 per cent to purchase lands; 3.3 per cent for buildings and improvements; 3.2 per cent for equipment, fertilizer, livestock, and irrigation; and 5 per cent for stock in national farm loan associations. Approximately 80 per cent of the loans were made for the repayment of debts. Adding another 5 per cent for purchase of stock in farm loan associations, a balance of only 15 per cent is left for loans made for productive purposes.

All these data go to show that something must be done immediately to increase values. It is of little permanent help to pass measures to extend more credit to the farmers. The farmer should have credit wherever necessary, and I do not criticize any of the measures that have been passed to provide additional credit. They are all right so far as they go, but they are mere palliatives—temporary makeshifts. Furthermore, there are a lot of farmers who will receive no benefit from such measures because they no longer have a basis of collateral left upon which a loan can be made. The heart of this problem is to raise the prices of farm products. Until that is done, credit measures will be of little avail.

If this Congress had devoted half the time and exerted half the effort and zeal in restoring farm prices which it has manifested in extending credit to the banks and the various industries of this country, we would have passed legislation which would have gone a long way toward solving the real difficulty confronting the farmer, and then having rescued agriculture, we would have gone a long way toward restoring prosperity to the entire country.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am interested in the statement made by the Senator. The picture which he has presented is a tragic one. I was wondering, in view of his last statement, what recommendations, if any, he intends to submit to the Senate for legislation that will alleviate the situation and raise the commodity prices of agricultural products pari passu—commodity prices generally.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, whereas I have introduced a bill which I feel would be effective in the circumstances, and particularly desirable because it might be passed, yet in the remarks I have been making on the floor respecting agriculture for some days past, I have not been advocating a particular measure. What I have been trying to bring to the consciousness of the Senate is that we have been in session approaching six months; and we have not considered one constructive measure for the farmer. Upon the calendar of the Senate there is not a bill now pending of such character. I have stood here and repeatedly asked, What are we going to do about it? Are we going to adjourn without attempting to do anything constructive for the farmer?

Mr. President, early in the session we passed a measure—I am now referring to the moratorium for the banks. Then we passed a bill for the establishment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to aid banks and railroads. Then we passed a bill, introduced by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]—the so-called Glass-Steagall bill—again for the banks. Now, Mr. President, when I look at to-day's calendar of the Senate I find on the front page that another bill for the benefit of the banks will have the floor at 2 o'clock. What are we going to say to the farmers?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. KING. That is why I am inquiring of the Senator if he has any suggestion to make. The tragic condition of agriculture must appeal, it seems to me, not only to Senators but to all classes of people throughout the United States. If no relief is obtained by the farmers, they will soon be at the end of their resources, and if we can do anything rational and constructive to relieve them from their terrible plight there should be no delay in acting.

May I say with reference to the Senator's implied criticism of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation measure, I feared that it would fall short of the expectations of some of its earnest supporters?

Mr. HOWELL. But, Mr. President, may I say to the Senator, I voted for that bill and I was merely calling attention to the fact that the Senate passed three measures for the benefit of bankers, and in one of these bills included the railroads, and that now we are to consider a fourth bank measure before doing anything for the farmer? That is the point I wished to make clear.

Mr. KING. The point I was going to suggest was that it was contended—and I think with some force—that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation measure would afford relief to many large and small banks and prevent them from suspending. It was important to prevent, if possible, further bank failures and provide means to reopen some that had been closed.

All classes were deeply concerned in saving our banking institutions, and in preventing the collapse of industrial plants that furnished employment to thousands of people.

With respect to the railroads, obviously if they ceased to operate or went into the hands of receivers, the economic and industrial conditions would be aggravated, tens of thousands of men would be thrown out of employment, and the industrial fabric further weakened. That would add to the tragic condition that exists in the United States. The bonds and stocks of the railroads are owned largely by insurance companies, widows, orphans, estates, small investors; and anything that would injuriously affect railroads would injure the masses of the people.

So I have believed that anything that would prevent such a catastrophe as the destruction of the railroads demands our consideration. The farmers, as well as all classes, are interested in preserving our transportation companies. Farmers need railroads to transport their commodities, and are advantaged by hundreds of thousands of railroad employees receiving wages in order that they may be purchasers of farm products.

Mr. HOWELL. But, Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the railroads have been operating, they operated last year, and that while the farmer was receiving 62 for what he sold he was paying 121 for what he bought as compared in each case with the years prior to the war. I want to ask the Senator if he does not think that we are putting emphasis upon what we should do for the creditor? What about the debtor?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator. The debtor is under the harrow, and if not saved he will drag creditors down with him. Whatever will promote the interests of those bound beneath burdens of debts will advance the interests of all. I am urging consideration of the silver question, in order that the credit structure of the country may be strengthened and that commodity prices may be raised to higher levels.

Mr. HOWELL. Let me ask the Senator another question. Does not the Senator think that we ought also to do something constructive in the way of assuring the farmer a higher price relatively for what he sells?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should be happy to see agricultural prices advanced to the level which they attained several years ago.

Mr. HOWELL. Why should not the farmer have the benefit of the tariff rates that have been afforded him by Congress?

Mr. KING. He should have.

Mr. HOWELL. He has not that benefit now. Agricultural tariffs are not effective.

Mr. KING. And he should have foreign markets for his surplus products. May I say to my friend that we have followed the fetish of protection so far that we have almost destroyed our foreign markets, our foreign trade is rapidly diminishing, and our ships will soon be idle in our harbors. The farmers are the victims of embargoes, of tariff policies that destroy our international trade.

Mr. HOWELL. But, irrespective of what the Senator's view and my view may be respecting the tariff—and I think we both voted the same way in connection with the last tariff bill—the tariff is a fact. It does not protect the farmer so far as his products are concerned. Therefore, ought we not to endeavor, at least, to adopt a constructive measure that might assure him the benefit of the tariff?

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator has stated that we have done nothing for the benefit of the farmer. I think we have done a few things that ought to help him.

For instance, we appropriated $125,000,000 for increasing the capital of the Federal land banks with the idea that that would enable them to make new loans and also enable them to grant extensions in meritorious cases.

The Senate has also passed a bill which makes eligible for rediscount, attached to paper as collateral, the debentures of intermediate credit banks. That, I think, will be very helpful to the intermediate credit banks.

As the Senator has said, these are all matters of facilitating loans and extending credit, which after all does not get to the real basis of the matter, as the Senator says, which is to devise some means whereby the farmer can enjoy an adequate return, or some living return, from what he produces. That is the great problem.

We have helped the farmer in giving him financial accommodations. We have tried to help him in marketing and distribution. We have not made much of a success of that. The real problem is to determine how we can arrange matters so that the farmer will get something more than the cost of production out of what he produces; but we have done the things I have mentioned.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if it is not a fact that what we ought to try to do is to give the farmer a United States price for what he sells, inasmuch as he must pay a United States price for what he buys? Is not that a fact?

Mr. FLETCHER. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. HOWELL. I have recently been speaking upon this subject on the floor of the Senate on a number of occasions, because I feel that we can not go home, face the farmer, and tell him that we have been in session for six months, but that the Senate would not even consider a bill for his constructive relief. Something must be done.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HOWELL. I do.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It must be quite plain to the Senator that official Washington does not want to do anything for the farmer.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I hesitate to accept that view, and yet I must admit that though I have talked and urged that something be done for agriculture before we adjourn, nothing has been done, and other measures are given the right of way. Now, with the fourth bank bill before us and the tax bill in the offing, I do not see how we can reach an agricultural measure, even if it were on the calendar at this time, before two weeks; yet we are to adjourn about June 10.

Remember that we can not go home and offer an alibi. We have none. We have had the time. We have had the opportunity. We considered and passed a bill the other day authorizing the building of the Navy up to the standard provided by the treaty of 1922, but we have had no time to consider, let alone pass, a constructive measure for the American farmer.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I am very much impressed by the Senator's earnestness and zeal. I wish he would inform us what is the bill that he wishes the Senate to consider. I should be inclined to consider the bill under the Senator's leadership.

What is the bill that the Senator wishes us to consider?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, if I stood on this floor and talked every day on one bill I could hardly justify my course. I have simply urged that the committee report something. I am for any bill that will constructively aid the farmer. I have not a child that I am talking for. What I want done is that the Agricultural Committee shall report and place upon the calendar a requisite measure or measures. Mr. President, I now offer a resolution to that effect, namely, that the Senate request the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to report immediately a measure or measures having for its or their purpose the constructive rehabilitation of agriculture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, it is impossible to consider this matter to-day. I ask that it go over under the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under objection, the resolution will go over under the rule.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection to the resolution itself.

Mr. HOWELL. I regret very much that the Senator should ask that the resolution go over.

Mr. McNARY. There are only a few Senators here. There is not time in which to act. I insist on my objection.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, as I have said before, the Senate has done nothing. It has been in session nearly six months, and unless action is immediately taken it will be impossible to get a bill through this Congress. Now, I ask again, What are we going to do about it? What are we to say to the farmer?

Both of the great political parties are on record with promises and pledges to rescue agriculture.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that the debenture plan which was under consideration at the last session of Congress, as I recall, and which the President opposed, would afford relief to agriculture?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the debenture plan has been in effect in Germany for a great many years. There is no question but that it would aid agriculture; but, unfortunately, we are trying to fill up the Treasury barrel, and because such a measure would constitute the removal of another bung from the barrel I fear that this Congress could not be induced to adopt that form of aid.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that the equalization plan, which was also under consideration, and which was vetoed, as I recall, by a distinguished President, would meet the situation or alleviate the condition of the farmers?

Mr. HOWELL. I believe that plan is worthy of experiment. I believe that we ought to experiment with that plan. Furthermore, I believe it is probably the measure most likely to pass both Houses of Congress, because it is understood in both Houses of Congress. Therefore, if they should pass upon the question, they would do so with full knowledge. We would not have to go through months of education, as would be necessary with a new measure.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will permit me, while I voted for the proposition first mentioned—the debenture—it seems to me that we ought to pass a measure that would not be considered as an experiment but which would give reasonable promise of accomplishing the object which the Senator has so much at heart. I should be very happy to support him in any rational and feasible measure that would aid agriculture and restore the prices of agricultural products in the United States.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I wish there were some measure that the able Senator from Utah and I might be absolutely confident would bring about the result to which he has referred; but I look upon any measure that may be proposed as an experiment. Governmental business is not different from private business; and when we make a marked departure in some direction in private business, we usually do it in the way of experiment. Therefore it is not because I merely want an experiment that I make the suggestion, but it is because it seems to me that probably that would prove the most direct route to our objective.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not think it is necessary for the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to refer at length to the proposal made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL].

I may say that after a great many years the three great farm organizations—the Farmers' Union, the National Grange, and the Farm Bureau Federation—have finally pooled their interests and have come to a general accord and agreement with respect to remedies. This information probably is not unknown to the Senator from Nebraska; but one of the reasons why agriculture has been unsuccessful in persuading Congress to bring about something in the nature of a relief measure is because of the division of agricultural organizations among themselves.

This plan was matured only a few days ago; and on Thursday the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry introduced a bill covering three major amendments to the farm marketing act which probably will be reported out from the committee within a few days. That is an accomplishment, from the standpoint of the agriculturalist, beyond any that heretofore has been known. Those who are advised in the matter consider that no such headway has ever been made by those interested in farm relief as has been made this year.

I have no objection to the proposal made by the Senator from Nebraska. It is a perfectly harmless thing; but the thought that is embodied in it has already been acted upon by the agricultural people who are sincerely interested in their own condition and will be followed out, in my opinion, by the committee. To-morrow, when the proper time comes, if we have an adjournment to-day, the Senator's resolution having gone over for the day at my request because of the absence of a great many Senators, I shall interpose no objection to the passage of the proposal made by the Senator from Nebraska.

EVERGLADES NATIONAL PARK

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Florida Times Union, of Jacksonville, Fla., on Tuesday, May 3, 1932, relating to the creation and maintenance of a national park in the Everglades section of Florida.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EVERGLADES PARK CREATION URGED

Cogent reasons for the creation and maintenance of a national park in the Everglades section of Florida were presented in a series of resolutions adopted by the Florida Entomological Society, in session in Gainesville during the recent annual meeting of the Florida Horticultural Society. It was set forth in the preamble to the resolutions that were offered, and unanimously adopted, that as the Congress of the United States has before it a bill providing for the establishment of such a park, "The Florida Entomological Society wishes to express its unqualified approval of the project, and to call your (the Congress) attention to the following reasons why such a park should be established."

Because expression, coming from such an important organization as is the Florida Entomological Society, which also is so well qualified to judge of the needs and value of such a national park as is the one proposed for establishment in the Florida Everglades, is worthy of considerate attention, it is in order to reproduce the resolutions referred to above, as follows:

"1. This is a unique region, the only territory in the continental United States where tropical vegetation and animal life are an undisturbed possession. It is the most northern extension of wild tropical life and contains many animals and plants to be found nowhere else on earth.

"2. The area needs protection, especially from fire and hunters. It has already been seriously injured by fire and there is danger, unless prompt protection is forthcoming, of its early destruction.

"3. Such destruction, either by fire or by industrial development, would be an irreparable loss to science, as there is no other area on earth where the same combination of plant and animal life can be found.

"4. The area is of little commercial value, but is a rich field for scientific investigation by naturalists and other lovers of nature.

"5. Its upkeep would be inexpensive. To protect it from the ravages of fire and selfish or careless man is the chief thing, and then to let it alone as a place where nature, untouched by the hand of man, will be allowed to take her course. Aside from the practical ones, such as the investigation of plant and animal life under wild conditions in its relation to agriculture, animal industry, and horticulture, the study of nature in a virginal condition has its æsthetic and cultural values.

"6. It has been the policy of the Government in the past to preserve and protect such unique areas in various parts of the United States by setting them aside as national parks. Such a commendable procedure should be continued by the present Congress for this equally unique territory—the Everglades of Florida, the largest grass marsh in the world and the 'hammocks' of the region, containing the only tropical vegetation in the continental United States and the only place in the United States where crocodiles and many other unique animals are to be found."

Florida can not present more urgent reasons for desiring establishment and maintenance of this proposed national park in this State than the ones above so briefly and yet so comprehensively and convincingly stated. Nor should the Congress require additional reasons to justify the passage of the tropic Everglades National Park bill which now is awaiting final action in the House, it having been passed in the Senate. This final action is all that is required to make the bill a law, there being reasonable assurance that it will be approved by President Hoover if and when presented to him, especially as no additional expenditure of public funds is involved, the proper department being able to take over this park project and carry it into establishment with money appropriated by the Congress for its regular functioning. The Congress has good and sufficient reasons, including those adopted by the Florida Entomological Society, for making this proposed park available for millions of people who are anxious for its creation and for unnumbered millions, who, in the centuries to come, will enjoy its blessings.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, there are only a few moments remaining before the expiration of the morning hour. I ask unanimous consent that we take up the calendar and consider unobjected bills only.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I appreciate that under the rules of the Senate the Senator is entitled to ask that the calendar be considered during the morning hour, but I hope that he will permit me to take up for consideration Senate Joint Resolution 137. This resolution has been before the Senate for some time and I am very anxious to have it acted upon. The resolution authorizes and requests the President to call an international conference for the purpose of considering and devising plans to increase the use of silver and for other purposes, and to consider plans to restore silver to its proper monetary status as a part of the primary and basic money of the world. It also authorizes the President to appoint five or more commissioners to represent the United States at such conference. It carries an appropriation of $100,000 to meet the expenses connected with the conference. If the resolution passes this body and the House, it will go to the President, who, of course, will either sign or veto the same.

There is a growing feeling in this and other countries that an international conference should be held for the purpose of considering this important matter. The resolution refers to the fact that for centuries gold and silver at a substantially uniform ratio were used interchaneably and discharged all the functions of money, and further that the demonetization of silver was followed by disastrous economic, industrial, and political consequences.

The resolution also refers to the heavy burdens of debt resting upon the peoples of the world and to the fact that the quantity of basic or primary money in the world is inadequate to support credits and currencies and has caused distress and fears as to existing financial policies and the ability of nations and individuals to discharge their indebtedness. The resolution also refers to the acts of Congress passed in 1893, 1897, and 1900, wherein it is declared that the policy of the United States is to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and that the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of a safe system of bimetallism. One of these acts also authorized the President to appoint commissioners to represent the United States at any international monetary conference called by the United States or other countries with a view to securing by international agreement a bimetallic system, and appropriated $100,000 to meet the expenses of such international conference. It seems to me that the economic condition of the world demands a proper solution of what some are pleased to call the silver question and for that purpose an international conference should be called.

Mr. McNARY. I should like to accommodate the Senator from Utah, but I think his proposal is already on the calendar.

Mr. KING. It is not yet on the calendar.

Mr. McNARY. Is it on the table?

Mr. KING. It is on the table. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 137.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. There is one unanimous-consent request now pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent agreement proposed by the Senator from Oregon, that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of the parliamentary situation, I can not successfully interpose an objection to the request of the leader on the other side. I wish, however, that he would permit the consideration of the joint resolution to which I have referred.

Mr. McNARY. The difficulty, I apprehend, is that there are a number of Members of the Senate who would want to have the calendar taken up, and there are only 12 minutes of the morning hour remaining. If the Senator's proposal is pressed, I shall have to suggest the absence of a quorum, and there would be no time given for its consideration. I promise the Senator, however, that some day this week, probably in two days, we shall have a call of the calendar again, and his measure will be taken up. Is that agreeable to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KING. My friend is so amiable that I can not oppose his request, particularly in view of the limited time and the probability that my resolution could not be acted upon before the hour of 2 o'clock.

Mr. McNARY. I am speaking in the interest of the joint resolution of the Senator, and I would like to accommodate him. But we would not have an opportunity this morning to consider it. During the morning hour some time later in the week, after an adjournment has been taken, the Senator will have an opportunity, so far as I can give it to him, to have his joint resolution taken up.

Mr. KING. I appreciate the situation, and at the earliest opportunity I shall renew the request which I have made, to proceed to the consideration of Joint Resolution 137.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest that the President submit my request for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon?

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, in order not to interfere with the request of the Senator from Oregon, I shall refrain from making some remarks on a letter I have in the nature of a petition, but I ask that the letter be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Hon. HENRIK SHIPSTEAD,
Senate Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: We, the officers and members of the Lake Shore Local, No. 147, Farmers Educational and Cooperative Union of America, desire hereby to present a plain statement of the following facts and conditions and earnestly petition for relief as outlined below, or for other adequate measures of financial assistance which will remedy the evils enumerated:

First. Farming under the present business conditions can not be made to pay. All farmers losing money rapidly. Farms going at an alarming rate by mortgage foreclosures. Unless speedy and efficient relief is afforded, then two or three years at the most will see all individual farmers bankrupt.

Second. Cause of farmers' failure is monopoly and unfair corporation control of our markets. Prices for farm products are far below the cost of production. Farmers can not meet expenses. For a decade we have been farming at a loss. At present we can not meet the cost of the barest living.

Third. Due to the blundering business management of the present administration the railroad freight rates have been marked up so high that the marketing of farm products, grain and livestock is done at a loss.

Fourth. Taxes are so high and applied in so many ways that the tax burden has become in itself a cause of bankruptcy.

RELIEF MEASURES WHICH ARE IMPERATIVE AND MUST BE FORTHCOMING AT THIS SESSION OF CONGRESS OR INDIVIDUAL AND BUSINESS DESTRUCTION STARES THE NORTHWEST IN THE FACE

Fifth. Immediate passage of the Frazier bill to afford temporary financial aid to the farmers is an outstanding need and must be forthcoming at once as a foundation for other helpful measures.

Sixth. We must have a law to break the monopoly control of our markets and establish a fair price for farm products. A minimum price standard must be established to meet the present financial crisis and thus allow the farmers to hold their farms against the forces of organized monopoly and against the high factory prices and the high prices of imported articles. We hereby emphatically indorse the Swank-Thomas bill, H. R. 7797.

Seventh. Congress must immediately pass a law either abolishing the Interstate Commerce Commission or a law compelling that body to reduce freights to a rational business basis. Present freight rates are breaking both the railroads and the farmers of the Northwest. Freight rates so high that all the business is going on the highways by trucks. Passengers by bus. Freight rates so high that nothing is left for us farmers who produce bulky products like grain and livestock. The people of the Northwest have gone bankrupt this winter paying freight on coal absolutely required to keep us from freezing. The only relief is immediate reduction in freight rates to a common-sense business basis. The idea of pampering railroads until everyone is bankrupt is high treason to the American people. The transportation question must be regulated to a sane and reasonable rate.

Eighth. Some means must be found to transfer the tax burden from the farms, which are now almost worthless, to the shoulders of the corporations and millionaires of the East. A system which will allow one man to accumulate more than a billion of dollars and then transfer this capital to Europe is a high crime against our citizens and treason to this Republic. The money grabbers and the overwealthy must be made to pay the taxes while yet there is time to succor and help some of the farmers.

Ninth. The money system of the country must be made adequate to meet the demands of business and investment. The best method with which to meet the present emergency would seem to be the remonetization of silver as provided in the Wheeler bill—S. 2487. Relief must come quickly, which means that the present Congress must act during the present session or the United States is doomed to become a nation of paupers ruled by overlord millionaires.

CONCLUSIONS

Conditions in the Northwest are rapidly growing worse. We regret to be sending trouble reports to Washington, but an honest appraisement of deplorable conditions now existing in the Northwest compels plain speaking. Not over 10 per cent of the farmers are solvent. At least 50 per cent of them are hopelessly bankrupt. Large numbers are losing everything they ever had.

Causes: Wheat sells for 30 cents a bushel; even lower. Hogs, $3. Cattle, $4 per hundredweight. Butter, 15 cents a pound. Eggs, 6 cents a dozen, and everything else that the farmer has to sell is down on the pauperizing scale. On the other hand, coal costs $20 a ton. Freight rates so high as to be a damper on business. We emphasize the following evils: The high prices of merchandise; the high taxes; high freight rates and the high tariff have broken the farmer financially, and now low prices for everything that the farmer has to sell are finishing the job not only of making bankrupts of the farmers and every business but breaking everyone and everything in the Northwest.

Relief must be sure and speedy and of sufficient amount to materially help or else the condition is hopeless. No makeshift aid or blatant promise of help will be of avail at present. Material and worth-while help must come from the present Congress at the present session or the wreck will be complete.

Certainly the present administration in Washington should be condemned and ostracized. They started in 1920 with business and the Nation in good shape and now all we have left is wreckage.

Here is hoping that Congress will be able to afford relief from the business chaos which we have encountered as a result of Hoover's and Coolidge's lack of wisdom.

America can not, and never will, be a nation of serfs ruled by despotic billionaires. Americans are home-loving, square-shooting, and God-fearing people. They will not see this Nation further disgraced by gangster rule and millionaire dictatorship. The god of greed and gold has headed the good old United States on the downhill path toward the same destruction which overtook the Roman Empire, but the man in the field, the man in the shop, and the man on the street is girding himself for the task of rehabilitating our Government or rescuing our Nation from the hands of the destroyers.

We hereby petition Congress for help in the great task of reestablishing human justice and political freedom and equality before the law. The people of America will never submit to a government by the rich and for the rich. Human greed and avarice must be brought to the bar of simple justice and that speedily.

Signed for the Lake Shore local by ALFRED O. BORAAS, President,

OSCAR S. PEDERSON, Secretary.

MADISON, MINN., May 5, 1932.

THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon that the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar? The Chair hears none. At what point does the Senator desire to begin on the calendar?

Mr. McNARY. I ask that we may begin where we left off on the last call of the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next order of business is 629, and the clerk will report the bill.

EDGAR H. TABER

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2434) for the relief of Edgar H. Taber, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 9, after the word "disability," to insert the words "Provided, That no compensation, retirement pay, back pay, pension, or other benefit shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Edgar H. Taber, late staff sergeant of the Eighty-eighth Aero Squadron of the Air Service, United States Army, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged March 30, 1921, from the military service of the United States, on account of physical disability: Provided, That no compensation, retirement pay, back pay, pension, or other benefit shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation of that measure.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, Edgar H. Taber enlisted June 12, 1919, and was honorably discharged on October 22, 1920, at Walter Reed General Hospital, on certificate of disability, a staff sergeant, Eighty-eighth Aero Squadron, character "excellent." His disability was due to an airplane crash while on duty. He reenlisted on October 23, 1920, at the Army Medical School, Washington, D. C., and was discharged March 30, 1921.

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator whether under existing law this man is not entitled to some compensation, if he was in the Army?

Mr. FLETCHER. The authorities claim he was not entitled to compensation because he had not stated, when he last enlisted, that he had at one time had a "blue discharge," which they claim is neither honorable nor dishonorable. He enlisted the last time without specifying his disability, and when the authorities found that out they said, "You fraudulently enlisted. You ought to have mentioned this disability when you enlisted the second time." That was the only offense he committed. He had the service record, he had the disability, was treated, and all that, and that is all certified to. The only objection was that he had this "blue discharge," because of an alleged fraudulent enlistment, in that he did not tell of his disability.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed, and to be read the third time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, and to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 7233) to enable the people of the Philippine Islands to adopt a constitution and form a government for the Philippine Islands, to provide for the independence of the same, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

MIDDLE TENNESSEE JUDICIAL DISTRICT

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10277) to transfer Lincoln County from the Columbia division to the Winchester division of the middle Tennessee judicial district, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Lincoln County of the Columbia division of the middle district of the State of Tennessee is hereby detached from the Columbia division and attached to and made a part of the Winchester division of the middle district of such State.

CRATER LAKE NATIONAL PARK

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4070) to authorize the acquisition of a certain building, furniture, and equipment in the Crater Lake National Park, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys with an amendment, on page 1, line 4, to strike out "(Incorporated)" and to insert in lieu there "Inc.," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to acquire from Kisers, Inc., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Oregon, free of all incumbrances and at a price of $1,000 (1) the building in the Crater Lake National Park formerly used by such corporation as a photographic studio and now used by the United States in connection with the administration of such national park, and (2) all furniture and equipment, including a Kohler lighting plant, located in or belonging to such building. The sum of $1,000 is hereby authorized to be appropriated for carrying out the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9970) to add certain land to the Crater Lake National Park in the State of Oregon, and for other purposes, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all of that certain tract described as follows: Beginning on the south boundary line of Crater Lake National Park at 4-mile post No. 112; thence west along the south boundary line of said park 4.26 chains which is the northwest corner of this tract; thence south 114.42 chains; thence south 40° 50′ east, 84.39 chains; thence east 15.13 chains to highway stake No. 130; thence north 89° 30′ east, 18.6 chains; thence north 20.83 chains; thence north 19° 40′ west, 126.04 chains; thence north 27° 52′ west, 43.50 chains to the south boundary of Crater Lake National Park; thence west 24 chains following the south boundary of said park to the place of beginning, in the State of Oregon be, and the same is hereby, excluded from the Crater National Forest and made a part of the Crater Lake National Park subject to all laws and regulations applicable to and governing said park.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10284) to authorize the acquisition of additional land in the city of Medford, Oreg., for use in connection with the administration of the Crater Lake National Park, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to acquire on behalf of the United States for use in connection with the present administrative headquarters of the Crater Lake National Park, that certain tract of land in the city of Medford, Jackson County, Oreg., adjoining the present headquarters site and described as lot 4, block 2, central subdivision to said city of Medford, Oreg., which tract of land has been offered to the United States for the purpose aforesaid by the city of Medford, Oreg., free and clear of all encumbrances for the consideration of $300.

SEC. 2. That not to exceed the sum of $300 from the unexpended balance of appropriations heretofore made for the acquisition of privately owned lands and/or standing timber within the national parks and national monuments be, and the same is hereby, made available for the acquisition of land herein authorized.

FINAL PROOF BY HOMESTEAD ENTRYMEN

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9591) to extend the period of time during which final proof may be offered by homestead entrymen, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to extend for a period of not to exceed two years the period during which final proof may be offered by any homestead entryman upon public lands of the United States if the date requiring the submission of such final proof by any such entryman under existing law falls within the period beginning July 1, 1931, and ending December 31, 1933: Provided, That any such entryman shall be required to show that it is a hardship upon himself to meet the requirements incident to final proof upon the date required by existing law, due to adverse weather or economic conditions.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make such rules and regulations as are necessary to carry out the purposes of this act.

PATENTS FOR LANDS IN COLORADO

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10744) to authorize the issuance of patents for certain lands in the State of Colorado to certain persons, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior, in his judgment and discretion, is hereby authorized, after due inquiry, to issue patents in the manner hereinafter provided for any of those lands situated in the State of Colorado which were, as a result of the adjustment of the land grant to Leavenworth, Pawnee & Western Railroad Co., to which the Union Pacific Railroad Co. succeeded, restored to the public domain by the Secretary of the Interior on May 20, 1931, to be disposed of under existing applicable public land laws.

SEC. 2. That any person, association, corporation, or municipality which, in good faith under color of title prior to the date of said restoration, placed valuable improvements upon, occupied or cultivated, or otherwise exercised dominion over any of the lands so restored, or who on or since said date of restoration became the grantee, transferee, or assignee of such person, association, corporation, or municipality, shall have a preference right to purchase the lands so held by him upon the filing of an application therefor and payment of $1.25 per acre or fraction thereof within six years from the date of the passage of this act: Provided, That upon any such application filed within three years from the date of the enactment hereof payment of said $1.25 per acre is hereby waived. Every such application must be accompanied with satisfactory proof that the applicant is entitled to such preference right and that the lands which he applies to purchase are not in the legal possession of an adverse claimant: Provided further, That any such applicant may, if he so elects, perfect his title under any applicable public land law, if qualified thereunder.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to issue all necessary rules and regulations for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act.

ANNE B. SLOCUM

The bill (S. 3191) for the relief of Anne B. Slocum was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Anne B. Slocum, widow of Clarence Rice Slocum, late American consul at Fiume, the sum of $3,500, being one year's salary of her deceased husband, who died while in the Foreign Service; and there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sufficient sum to carry out the purpose of this act.

PASSPORT FEES

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9393) to increase passport fees, and for other purposes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to have an explanation of this bill. We have had so many complaints about the very heavy charges in regard to passports that I was wondering whether we were justified in increasing the rate.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the chairman of the committee which reported the bill is absent, and I can only say to the Senator that this measure provides for a fee of $9 for a passport, which obtained prior to 1930, when the fee was reduced, and it provides for a 2-year period of renewal at a cost of $5. The State Department, which has always been exceedingly proud of the fact that the fees from this source have enabled the passport section of the department to be self-sustaining, feels that it can continue to be so if the former basis is restored; and probably that action should be taken, in the present financial situation of the Treasury.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the act entitled "An act to regulate the issue and validity of passports, and for other purposes," approved July 3, 1926, as amended by the act entitled "An act to provide for the renewal of passports," approved July 1, 1930, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the validity of a passport or passport visa shall be limited to a period of two years: Provided, That a passport may be renewed under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of State for a period, not to exceed two years, upon payment of a fee of $5 for such renewal, but the final date of expiration shall not be more than four years from the original date of issue: Provided further, That the Secretary of State may limit the validity of a passport, passport visa, or the period of renewal of a passport to less than two years: Provided further, That the charge for the issue of an original passport shall be $9."

CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES

The resolution (S. Res. 174) for an investigation of campaign expenditures of presidential and senatorial candidates in 1932 was announced as next in order.

Mr. GEORGE. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over, under objection.

CLAIM OF OSAGE NATION OF INDIANS

The bill (S. 2352) amending the act entitled "An act authorizing the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment in the civilization fund claim of the Osage Nation of Indians against the United States," approved February 6, 1921 (41 Stat. 1097), was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. At the request of the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

LAC DU FLAMBEAU INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8637) to authorize the sale, on competitive bids, of unallotted lands on the Lac du Flambeau Indian Reservation, in Wisconsin, not needed for allotment, tribal, or administrative purposes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs whether this bill is in the interest of the Indians. I am wholly unfamiliar with it. I am reassured when I see that it was reported by the able senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who is now in the chair; but, having propounded the question, I shall be very glad if the Senator from North Dakota will briefly explain it.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, this is a House bill, which I think is in the interest of the Indians. It provides for the sale of some of the land on their reservation. It has been so long since the bill was considered by the committee that I really have forgotten the particulars of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). The present occupant of the chair will state to the Senator from Utah that as the bill is now drawn it refers to only one tract of land on the reservation, and the Indians have indicated that they have no objection to the enactment of the bill.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to it; but I want to make this observation: I consider the policy of the Government in dealing with the lands allotted to the Indians to have been unwise and very harmful to the Indians. The course which is being pursued will eventuate within a few years in having the great majority of the Indians landless, poverty stricken, without homes, and without means of support. Unless we change our policy in dealing with the allotted lands of the Indians we shall soon have upon our hands 190,000 Indians, most of whom will be without any means of support.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That authority is hereby granted the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, with the consent of the Indians and under such terms and regulations as he may deem proper, to sell on competitive bids that portion of the unallotted lands in the Lac du Flambeau Indian Reservation in Wisconsin comprising lot 5, section 7, township 40, range 5 east, containing 21 acres, more or less, title to be transferred to the purchasers by deed or by patent in fee.

CLAIMS OF WISCONSIN INDIANS

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 125) authorizing the attorney general of Wisconsin to examine Government records in relation to claims of Wisconsin Indians, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Whereas by chapter 144 of the Session Laws of the State of Wisconsin for the year 1931 the attorney general of said State is directed to investigate and prosecute to a conclusion all legitimate claims against the Federal Government of Indians residing in Wisconsin; and

Whereas in conformity with said statute the attorney general desires to examine records of the Federal Government relating to Indians within the State of Wisconsin: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the attorney general of the State of Wisconsin, or his duly accredited representative, is authorized to examine official letters, papers, documents, and records of the United States Government, and to make copies thereof, without expense to the United States; and the departments and the independent establishments of the Government shall give access to the attorney general of Wisconsin, or his duly accredited representative, to such official letters, papers, documents, and records as may be needed by the attorney general of Wisconsin in carrying out the provisions of the aforesaid chapter 144 of the Session Laws of Wisconsin of 1931.

The preamble was agreed to.

C. B. BELLOWS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 615) for the relief of C. B. Bellows, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to C. B. Bellows, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,141 in full settlement of damages sustained on January 31, 1930, at the Municipal Airport, Long Beach, Calif., when the hangar owned by said C. B. Bellows was damaged by the crash of 0–2–U–I Landplane No. 7543, operated under the jurisdiction of the Navy Department.

G. CARROLL ROSS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1554) for the relief of G. Carroll Ross.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, perhaps I should not say this, but it is very strange for the Senate to be passing House bills when we can not get any action in the other body on Senate bills. With all due respect to that body, they do not seem to take up our bills over there at all.

We are passing House bills in the Senate right along. Half a dozen of them have been passed this morning. I am willing that the Senate shall act on those bills, irrespective of the way the House treats us; but I do want to say, in protest, that we are entitled to some consideration in the other body in connection with the bills which we pass here and send to them. We pass House bills without any question at all, and we are glad to do it; but, in all fairness and justice, they ought to deal with the Senate in the same way.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to supplement what the Senator has said. We passed a Senate bill some time ago and sent it to the House. Instead of the House Committee to which it was referred considering it, a House bill textually the same was reported from the committee and the House then passed it and transmitted it to this body. The Senate referred it to the same committee that had reported the Senate bill; the committee has reported the House bill back to the Senate. Another bill the Senate passed was by the House referred to a committee, which pigeonholed it, and reported out a bill textually the same. The House thus passed the House bill and it is now before the Senate committee that reported the Senate bill. I am inclined to think if this course is continued by the House, some of the bills sent to the Senate may not be acted upon by Senate committees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the third reading of House bill 1554.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to G. Carroll Ross, of the city of South Haven, Mich., the sum of $200 to reimburse him for money expended in payment of a fine levied against Captain Quickfall, master of the British steamship Errington-Dunford, on October 8, 1925, for violation of section 8 of the act of June 19, 1886, as amended.

CHARLES LAMKIN

The bill (H. R. 2704) for the relief of Charles Lamkin was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think we should have a brief explanation of this bill, what it is for, and what it would accomplish.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, this is a bill which comes from the Department of Agriculture providing for the payment of $66 to Mr. Lamkin as reimbursement for equipment, building, and improvements destroyed by fire while being used in an attempt to save Government property. Mr. Lamkin was temporarily employed on the San Bernardino National Forest, and sparks from a near-by brush pile were falling on a haystack——

INCREASE OF BANKING FACILITIES

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 4412.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4412) to provide for the safer and more effective use of the assets of Federal reserve banks and of national banking associations to regulate interbank control, to prevent the undue diversion of funds into speculative operations, and for other purposes.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Austin	Costigan	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
Bankhead	Cutting	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Barbour	Dickinson	Kendrick	Schall
Barkley	Dill	King	Sheppard
Bingham	Fess	La Follette	Shortridge
Blaine	Fletcher	Logan	Smith
Bratton	Frazier	McKellar	Smoot
Bulkley	George	McNary	Thomas, Okla.
Bulow	Glass	Metcalf	Townsend
Byrns	Gore	Moses	Vandenberg
Capper	Hale	Norbeck	Wagner
Caraway	Hastings	Norris	Wheeler
Cohen	Hawes	Nye	White
Connally	Howell	Oddie
Coolidge	Hull	Patterson

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. GLASS addressed the Senate in support of the bill. After having spoken with interruptions for more than two hours he yielded the floor for the day. His speech will be published entire after it shall have been concluded.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Virginia is very tired and wishes to suspend his remarks. I do not know whether anyone else is prepared to proceed at this time.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have canvassed the situation and find that no Senator is prepared to proceed with the discussion of the measure at this time. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] does not wish to proceed until to-morrow. Under the circumstances I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 4 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 10, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.)

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate May 9, 1932

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, MAY 9, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God of Our Fathers, Thy merciful providences go far beyond our utmost expectations and our hopes. Thou dost bestow them not according to our merits or prayers but because of Thy holy, compassionate nature. Strengthen us to-day with the actual, transforming faith in Thee. Thou and Thou alone art the most precious source of vision and energy. One touch of Thy Spirit, one flash from Thy throne will reveal unto us the way and bring to our tasks a clearness and a certitude which will enable us to grip the truths by which we must work and live. Thus with Thy presence and with confidence may we approach our labors. In Thee may we always find the index to character and the way to the highest attainments. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

On May 6, 1932:

H. R. 8083. An act providing for the appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy of all midshipmen who graduate from the Naval Academy in 1932, and for other purposes.

MASONIC MUTUAL RELIEF ASSOCIATION OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 7357) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1869, as amended, and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, this is not the unfinished business.

Mrs. NORTON. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, what bill is this?

Mr. WOODRUM. The Acacia bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, there is to be an adjustment with respect to this matter, and I think we ought to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and I therefore object.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the military appropriation bill by showing in what manner certain officers of the Army would be affected by the proposed change.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the military appropriation bill, I have thought it proper and desirable that the House shall have an opportunity to know the names of the officers who would be retired by the passage of this bill, the State from which each comes, the source from which they entered the Army, and whether or not they had any former enlisted service in the Army.

I have, therefore, requested the War Department to prepare a correct list which will show the names of those to be retired by this act in each grade.

It must be remembered that four major generals and nine brigadier generals will be retired if this bill passes, but that instead of being retired for age alone those to be so retired may be selected by competent authority.

In every other instance in this list the selection for retirement will be made of the oldest officers in each grade without any discrimination as to their efficiency or as to whether or not they are more efficient and more desirable to be retained than those who are younger in years.

In this list certain abbreviations have been employed which have the following meanings:

MA—Military Academy.

Vol—Volunteers.

Em—Emergency.

Civ—Civil life.

The list so prepared by the War Department is as follows:
